Those were figures quoted by the Chief Secretary. It is now nine weeks since he did so. I have re-asked the question, and have just been told that it will be answered as soon as possible. Is there anything that you can do to encourage Ministers to answer questions more quickly?

Madam Speaker: There is nothing further I can do. I have answered points of order from the hon. Gentleman and other Back-Bench Members on this issue. The Government, I am sure, are very aware of it. No doubt, as he has raised a point of order yet again with me, they will look at it and respond as soon as possible.

Disabled Persons and Carers (Short-term Breaks)

4.25 pm

Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide for assessments of health and social needs of disabled persons to include assessments of the needs for short-term breaks for the disabled persons and any carer.

Every right hon. and hon. Member will have in their constituency a silent army of dedicated, selfless carers. They care for people with a wide variety of needs: people with physical disabilities, learning disabilities, mental health problems, chronic sickness and degenerative conditions. Carers can be of any age, and from all walks of life. One in seven of the adult population are estimated to be carers, the great majority of whom are women. Any of us could become a carer at any time.

That army of carers has increased in recent years, with the shift from institutional to community care, with the increase in the number of elderly people, and as a result of medical advances to sustain the lives of many people who would formerly not have survived. Those are the triumphs of our welfare state, but they have led to a disproportionate reliance on informal care, and care by women.

In recent years, our statutory agencies have put increasing responsibility on informal carers as a result of community care legislation. The National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990 gave local authorities a duty to undertake individual care assessments. The need for respite care, or short-term breaks, has increasingly been recognised as a major unmet need, but it is not specified in community care assessments. The Bill's aim is to give people with disabilities and carers the right to be assessed for respite care and to have that care provided, if they are so assessed.

It is important to establish appropriate respite care—to involve carers in decisions about their need for respite care. The Bill therefore extends the Carers (Recognition and Services) Act 1995, which was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North (Mr. Wicks).

That Act gave statutory recognition for the first time to the role of carers and their right to have their needs assessed, but it gave no right to the provision of services. That is why Lord Rix, chairman of Mencap, introduced a private Member's Bill similar to this Bill in the House of Lords in 1996. I am privileged to have been asked by Mencap to reintroduce that Bill into the House, and I thank it for the help that it has given me in promoting the Bill.

According to Mencap, 100,000 people with severe learning difficulties and their carers are not receiving much-needed respite care. Only 32 per cent. knew about respite care. Almost one in five carers who applied for respite care were refused it by a local authority or health authority.

In recent weeks, I have met groups of carers in my constituency. Those I have met have stressed the value they place on respite care for the person for whom they are caring. Respite care offers an opportunity to meet new people, for personal development, to be more independent, and to enjoy a new environment. In effect, short-term breaks for people with disabilities have the same attractions as they have for all of us.

Carers I have met say that they need short-term breaks too, to allow them to lead more ordinary lives, to recharge their batteries by going away for a couple of weeks, a few days or even a few hours—to spend time with their partners, their families and friends, to spend more time with their other children, to catch up with the housework, to go shopping, or simply to catch up on their sleep.

However, Mencap's research showed that four out of 10 carers had not been out for an evening in the past six months, and one in five not for the past five years. One mother wrote to me:

"I am very grateful for the 3 hours per week respite that we have through our Mencap Family Carer, but I am conscious of how fortunate we are compared to most others."

A short-term break may be covered in the carer's own home by a sitting service; it can be inexpensive, a small investment, but its value can be immense.

Respite care can be cost-effective, as has been shown by research carried out at the university of Brighton, where I worked before entering the House. The needs of carers were studied, and it was found that supporting carers can maintain their health, thus reducing the cost of hospitalisation and breakdowns among carers.

Respite care enables carers to return to work, which reduces the cost of benefits and increases tax and national insurance revenues. If carers could not or would not care, the responsibility would fall on the state. Official carers would be paid and receive time off and annual leave, whereas informal carers get next to nothing.

There are many forms of short-term break—holiday breaks, emergency breaks, family-based care and sitting services. In many areas, there are good examples of respite care provided through local authority social services and voluntary organisations. The all-Wales mental handicap strategy was a progressive strategy that established good collaboration between voluntary and statutory agencies. It was a progressive programme, with ring-fenced resources, but it lacked the statutory framework of rights that carers, and the people for whom they care, need.

However, respite care is scarce in many areas. Too much depends on where the carer happens to live. The aim of the Bill is to make respite care universally available, to raise standards nationally and to enshrine a right to a specific form of care, thereby imposing a duty on local authorities.

I am grateful for the support that many organisations have given me for the measure—organisations such as Mencap, the Carers National Association, Sense, the National Aids Trust, Age Concern, the British Medical Association and many other voluntary organisations. I am grateful, too, to the hon. Members on both sides of the House who have signed early-day motion 1090. However, it is the carers, more than others, that the House should thank—and society should thank them, too.

The Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1972 was piloted through the House by Alf Morris, who then represented Manchester, Wythenshawe. That Act was rightly seen as a charter for the disabled. Arguably, it was the most significant piece of legislation on disability in the post-war period, and it was passed by a Labour Government and implemented by a Conservative Government. The present Government have established a royal commission on long-term care, and we intend to make specific representations to it about the need for respite care.

My Bill will reinforce the work that the Government are doing to enhance the rights of people with disabilities. We need to establish a charter for carers, and the Bill will establish the right of carers to respite care and short-term breaks. It has cross-party support, and I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Huw Edwards, Ms Chris McCafferty, Mr. David Amess, Mrs. Betty Williams, Mr. Roy Beggs, Mr. Dafydd Wigley, Mr. Desmond Swayne, Mr. Paul Keetch, Mr. Malcolm Wicks, Mr. Steve McCabe, Mr. Anthony Wright and Laura Moffatt.

DISABLED PERSONS AND CARERS (SHORT-TERM BREAKS)

Mr. Huw Edwards accordingly presented a Bill to provide for assessments of health and social needs of disabled persons to include assessments of the needs for short-term breaks for the disabled persons and any carer: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 24 April, and to be printed [Bill 150].

Orders of the Day

WAYS AND MEANS

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [17 March].

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the National Debt and the public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance; but this Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting a supply, acquisition or importation;

(b) for refunding an amount of tax;

(c) for varying any rate at which that tax is at any time chargeable; or

(d) for any relief, other than a relief which—

(i) so far as it is applicable to goods, applies to goods of every description, and

(ii) so far as it is applicable to services, applies to services of every description.—[Mr. Gordon Brown.]

Question again proposed.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

4.34 pm

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden): Yesterday's Budget was the first that I have heard in which not a single measure introduced by a Chancellor of the Exchequer was costed. He gave no idea where the extra spending that he announced will come from. Overnight, we have been able to examine the small print and determine where the costs will fall. There will be a large cost, and it will fall on ordinary families and on businesses—which, ultimately, will have to pass on that cost to consumers, or reduce the number of those they employ.

The Chancellor pretended that we would have lots of goodies at no cost. He tried the oldest trick in the book: pretending that there is such a thing as a free lunch. What he really gave us was a menu without prices. I steer clear of establishments with such practices, because, although their presentation may be top class, one gets very small portions and pays very large bills. In paying the bill for the Chancellor's menu, we shall discover that he has, once again, betrayed the Prime Minister's promise to the British people not to impose any taxes other than the windfall tax.

Before the general election, the Prime Minister promised Birmingham business men:

"We have no plans to increase tax at all."

He told the BBC:

"What I have said is the programme of the Labour party, and that does not imply any tax increases at all."

Now—as we saw in last week's debate—Ministers are trying to airbrush those pledges out of the picture. They want us to think that the only pledge that matters is their narrow promise not to raise income tax rates. So when the Prime Minister made vows to his party conference, we should have taken no notice of him? When he gave unequivocal answers to the media, they counted for nothing? We should have read his lips, and seen "lots more taxes"? What arrogance from the Government. It tells us an awful lot about new Labour. Although new Labour thinks that words are cheap, British taxpayers will discover that believing Labour's words will cost them dear.

This Budget is new Labour's second tax-raising Budget. It raises taxes by another £2 billion a year, on top of the massive tax rises introduced in last July's Budget.

If Ministers are so keen—as they were last week—to direct us to the text of their manifesto pledges, will they tell us where in their manifesto they promised to cut the married couple's tax allowance? Perhaps in the section entitled "Supporting the Family"? Where did they promise to clobber businesses with almost £20 billion in extra taxes? In the section they headed "Promoting Enterprise"? Where did they spell it out that they would cut mortgage interest tax relief? Was it in the section on home ownership? Where did they spell out the increase in employers' national insurance charges for employees earning above the average wage? Where did they spell out three petrol duty hikes in 16 months? Where in their manifesto did they say that they plan to tax child benefit for upper-income families?

Ms Joan Ryan (Enfield, North): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that BP's announcement that it is reducing petrol prices in rural areas by a further 2p—totalling a 4p reduction in the past month—clearly shows that it approves of the Budget and is responding to the Chancellor's challenge to work with us in helping rural areas?

Mr. Lilley: That is a bit rich. Although the Government have hiked petrol tax three times in the past 15 or 16 months, Ministers claim credit for oil companies absorbing some of those increases because of low oil prices. They claim credit for that? The Government insult rural motorists by offering £50 million over three years, to compensate for almost £1 billion in extra taxation. Come off it. Read out something else from the brief next time.

Yesterday, the Chancellor may not have spelt out the cost of any of his policies, but his Red Book makes it clear. It shows that the share of national income taken in tax is set to increase. By the end of this Parliament, he will be taking nearly 3 per cent. more of national income in tax. That is the cost of Labour's tax programme; that is the cost of its stealth taxes. Public finances are strong, but because they are strong and doing even better than we expected, it should be possible to get back to a balanced Budget with fewer tax increases, not by adding to them as the Chancellor is doing.

The reason Labour is having to put up taxes is that it is breaking another pledge: its promise to cut the cost of the welfare state. Before the election, the then leader of the Labour party used to trail around editors' offices, particularly of right-wing newspapers, saying that, just as it took a Republican President such as Richard Nixon to recognise communist China, and just as it took a white President such as Pik Botha to do a deal with the African National Congress—[HON. MEMBERS: "It was P. W. Botha."] Well, whoever did it. The then Labour party leader said that it would take a Labour Prime Minister to cut the size of the social security bill.

Many editors thought that the then Labour party leader meant what he said. Indeed, Labour made cutting the social security bill a specific pledge in its manifesto. As part of its top pledge, it said that it would decrease the share of national income spent on the bills of economic and social failure. Labour said that it would cut the size of the welfare state, but since the election, every change that the Government have initiated in the welfare state—not those that they inherited from me—has involved increasing the cost of welfare; increasing spending on the welfare state, not reducing it.

The Red Book shows that yesterday's Budget will add another £10 billion to the cost of welfare this Parliament. That destroys Labour's promise and its claim that its programme could be financed without increasing taxes. Instead of reducing social security spending, Labour is increasing it. That is why people are having to pay more tax.

The Government do not even expect the welfare changes that they have introduced remotely to pay for themselves. It is clear from their figures that they expect very few extra people to be enticed back to work by the changes that they have made. I invite the Chancellor to tell us how many people he expects to be taken off the unemployment register as a result of the changes that he announced yesterday. Either he does not know or the number is so small that he will not tell. It is certainly invisible in the accounts that he published yesterday.

If unemployment is higher in two years' time than it is now, will the Chancellor admit that all his programmes have failed? We said—we have said all along—that we would support the Government if they brought forward the right welfare reforms. If they tackle the poverty trap, reduce the number of people who are dependent on benefit and bear down on the costs of the welfare state, they will certainly deserve the support of the whole House. This Budget does nothing of the kind. It increases spending, extends the number of people who are dependent on benefits and lumbers more people further up the income scale with greater disincentives to work.

The Red Book shows that the number of families facing a marginal deduction rate of more than 60 per cent. will be increased by 250,000 as a result of the changes that the Government have introduced. Therefore, more people will face greater disincentives, not fewer. As the Financial Times pointed out this morning in its analysis of the Government's child care credit:

"the assistance tapers so that help will be given for childcare costs for one child in families with incomes up to £22,000 and for two or more children in households with incomes up to £30,000".

The Government are bringing households with such income into the benefits system. The truth is that extending help up the income scale to people with good jobs will not get people into work.

People can get off welfare and into work only if there are jobs for them to go to. Our reforms succeeded in creating jobs hand over fist. Before the election, unemployment had been falling month in, month out for more than four years. That momentum has continued. The good news today is that unemployment is down again, as the continued consequence of our reforms.

The previous Government bequeathed a golden economic legacy of low inflation, steady growth, rising living standards and falling unemployment, which has come down to 5 per cent.—about half the level of France and Germany.

The new Government are betraying that golden economic legacy, putting this country's economic achievements at risk. After just 10 months in office, they have already hit pension funds with a £5-billion-a-year pensions tax, which means £5 billion a year less for British industry to invest. They have hit industry with a new quarterly payments regime that will cost companies £2 billion a year during this Parliament. In aggregate, industry will have to pay nearly £20 billion extra in taxes during this Parliament.

The Government have reduced the rate of corporation tax, but they have increased the burden falling on British companies. Businesses have been hit with higher national insurance contributions for employees earning more than the average level. That will hit high-tech companies, which the Government claim to want to promote. Because the Government have taxed business and savings, interest rates have had to go higher, driving up the exchange rate and hitting our exports.

Almost every economic decision that the Government have taken has helped to push our manufacturing sector towards the brink of recession. For five months in a row, output from manufacturing has fallen.

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central) rose—

Mr. Lilley: Doubtless the hon. Gentleman wants to tell us that that is what he was elected to achieve.

Mr. Davies: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that, arithmetically, only about a quarter of the exchange rate is explained by relative interest rates? Does he further agree that the real reason for the high value of the pound is the uncertainty over the euro—the fact that the drachma decided to come in and that nobody knows what the rate will be? The fact that people are investing in sterling is a testimony to the prudent policy of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. People know that investing in sterling is an investment in certainty and stable policies for the future.

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Gentleman made a brave try, but he is in difficulty because he does not know his Chancellor's policy on the exchange rate. We also do not know the Chief Secretary's policy. He was asked five times on "Newsnight" last night whether he thought that the exchange rate was at the right level. The Chancellor has said that he wants a stable pound. Does he want it stable at the present level, or does he want mobile stability?

Whatever the Government say, their friends in the Trades Union Congress have become disillusioned with their policy. Their analysis says:

"Because of the combined impact of the exchange rate, higher interest rates and tight public spending controls, unemployment will start to rise by the end of this year."

The Conservatives commissioned the Centre for Economics and Business Research, which has one of the best track records in recent years for forecasting the performance of the economy, to calculate the likely performance resulting from the combined effects of the two Budgets that the Chancellor has introduced compared with what would have happened under unchanged Conservative policies. It concludes that the main impact has been on the level of investment, which has been lowered by the taxes on business. As a result, the economy will grow more slowly and unemployment will be 100,000 a year higher under Labour than our policies would have achieved.

Thanks to decisions taken by our party in government, Labour inherited a buoyant economy that was generating increased tax revenues, taking people off welfare and helping to reduce public expenditure. That means that there was no need for the extra taxes that Labour has thrust on businesses and ordinary people. What it has done will damage investment and enterprise and will jeopardise our golden economic legacy.

As well as arranging for that analysis of the economic impact of the Chancellor's policies, we commissioned a study of the impact on individual households of the changes introduced in this Budget and the previous one. It shows that the Chancellor got his figures wrong. In the Red Book, a table shows that almost all households are better off as a result of this Budget—although the Government had to publish a corrigendum, showing that all the figures that they published were too rosy. Even the corrected figures are wrong, because they take account only of direct taxes. The Labour Government think that people do not have a car, do not drink, do not smoke, do not have a pension and do not save: all those ways in which this and the previous Budget hit ordinary households were not taken into account.

We asked the experts to look at a typical family with a couple of children and a mortgage, who contribute to a personal pension and own a car; we shall assume that they are not smokers, because they are a virtuous couple. The study showed that, next year, as a result of the changes introduced by the Chancellor, every household at all levels of income will be worse off. In the year after—when his increase in child benefit and the change to working families tax credit comes into force—only households with an income below £16,000 will be better off. All households of that type with an income above £16,000 will be worse off, as a result of the combined effect of direct and indirect taxes, increased by the Chancellor.

One thing we have learnt about the Chancellor—from books, of course, and from leaks from No. 10—is that he suffers from a psychological flaw. That flaw seems to inhibit him in consulting people about his policies before he announces them. He does not even consult his own officials sufficiently. We found that in his first Budget—he clearly had not consulted in detail about the plan that they cooked up in opposition, to scrap advance corporation tax credits. The Government did not realise that that meant abolishing foreign income dividends and, in turn, abolishing ACT and, in turn, that they would have to replace it with quarterly payments. They then had to come back yesterday and revise the system, because it was putting too great a squeeze on business. That was muddle enough.

The Government also had the muddle on individual savings accounts and abolishing personal equity plans and tax-exempt special savings accounts. The original proposals were a dog's breakfast, which would retrospectively have hit the most prudent the hardest. We may not have won the vote in the debate the week before last, but we won the argument. We could see from the expressions on the faces of Ministers that the Government would have to come back with a changed policy. It may be better than what they were proposing last November, but as the Institute for Fiscal Studies pointed out today, the Government could clearly have achieved almost all of that change by adjusting TESSAs, to allow people to take out their money sooner than was previously the case.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): Was not the original proposal indicative of Labour's total hostility to wealth creation? The Government have done a U-turn because of the arguments promoted by my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor and because their focus groups told them that the proposals were not popular. This is not a policy change out of principle—it is a policy change because they know that the proposal is unpopular in the country.

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend is right, but the damage has been done. The Government have revealed what they want to do to people's savings. That destroys trust, and it means that the likelihood of people saving as much in these ways in future is limited, because they fear that the Labour party might come back and change the system retrospectively, to damage them once again. That is why the Government forecast in the Red Book that the savings ratio is set to fall hard and fast in the years ahead. They themselves have undermined the savings culture in this country.

The Chancellor's failure to consult is revealed by more than the muddle arising from the changes to ISAs; he clearly has not thought out all the consequences of the move from family credit to working families tax credit. He recognises that, in 500,000 households, the woman could on average lose £40 a week to the benefit of the breadwinner into whose pay packet the money will be paid.

Although people will be given a choice about how the money will be paid, the Chancellor does not say how that choice will be exercised. He says that the choice is for the household, but will it be for the man or the woman? It will be a new source of discord for low-income families. Will he tell the House what will happen if they cannot agree? In her speech to the Fawcett Society, the Financial Secretary was unable to say what would happen, but perhaps she can tell us now. This is another matter about which there has been no consultation because of the Chancellor's psychological flaw.

Yvette Cooper (Pontefract and Castleford): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lilley: Perhaps the hon. Lady was consulted—I believe that she was recently married, so she will be able to tell the House how she will reach agreement with her spouse.

Yvette Cooper: If the right hon. Gentleman dislikes the working families tax credit so much, will he say whether a future Conservative Government would abolish it?

Mr. Lilley: The question is whether the Labour Government will fulfil the promises in their manifesto last year, not what will be in our manifesto in four years. They promised that they would reduce the cost of the welfare state and not plough further billions of pounds into it.

We also want to know whether the Minister for Welfare Reform still believes what he said when he commented on the Conservative Government's proposal to pay family credit through the wage packet. In a reasoned and thoughtful contribution, he said:

"Whatever scheme is enacted, if the parents behave as we hope we ourselves would behave, it would be irrelevant. But we are concerned with that minority—it may or may not be substantial—of families in which money for the children is not paid over to the wife. We must draw on our experience to decide whether it is more likely that the money will go where Parliament wishes it to go—towards the welfare of children—if it is paid to the mothers rather than the fathers. I believe from my experience and that of many other organisations that more money will get to children in those families where something is wrong if we pay the money to mothers rather than fathers."

The House has a right to know whether the Minister for Welfare Reform has altered his view on that. Conservative Members realise that the problems exist—we listen to reason and do our homework—but the Chancellor has not learnt from experience.

Again, on the proposal to tax child benefit for those on high pay, the Chancellor is too confused and muddled to spell out the details. He rushes to say that the proposal will be implemented, but he does not know how that will be done. I tell him that he faces some serious dilemmas. If he decides to tax on the basis of the income of the whole household, he must do away with independent taxation and take into account the joint income of husband and wife. However, if he does not do that, and taxes only the recipient of the child benefit—usually the mother—that will be very unfair, as modestly paid women who receive the benefit will have to pay tax on it because they are working, whereas the wives of rich husbands will not pay any tax on it, and will be given it in full.

The Chancellor hinted at a third option, whereby child benefit will be taxed only if one or other member of the household is liable to the 40 per cent. rate of tax. That infringes the principle of independent taxation and will prove unfair because, unlike at present, the couple will have to reveal to one another which tax band they are in.

If the Chancellor insists on making those whose household contains one or more members who are liable to tax at 40 per cent. pay a tax on their child benefit, a couple with a combined income of £50,000 might not have to pay, while someone with an income of £30,000 would. How can that be fair?

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): The right hon. Gentleman referred to child benefit. I had something to do with its introduction to replace the child tax allowances. That change was undertaken on the basis of an agreement between our two parties that child benefit would be uprated in the same way as the allowances were. The previous Government broke that promise, and the new Government have tried to restore some of the advantages that we—and, indeed, the Opposition of the day—foresaw.

Mr. Lilley: That is a fair enough point. The right hon. Gentleman played a distinguished part, and he will remember that child benefit replaced a tax allowance. Is it not extraordinary to tax a tax allowance? That is a strange proposal. It is the sort of idea that the Chancellor cooks up in the Paymaster General's Park lane flat or in one of his country retreats in Italy or France, without consulting officials.

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will recall for us the attitude that his party took towards joint and several liability for men and women under the poll tax, and tell us what action he took as Secretary of State for Social Security. Perhaps he will tell us whether he is for or against the proposal in the Budget.

Mr. Lilley: We abolished the poll tax and replaced it with the council tax. The Government have introduced the biggest rise ever in council tax. Before the general election, the Prime Minister—

Mr. Blunkett rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. Both right hon. Gentlemen must sit down. The right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) is not going to give way.

Mr. Lilley: I did not want to cause you to rule out of order a long debate on the poll tax, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Before the general election, the Prime Minister tried to convince the British people that Labour's days of redistributive politics were long gone, but the more one looks at the Budget, the more its redistributive nature becomes clear. Perhaps the title of the Red Book, "New Ambitions for Britain", provides a clue.

Yesterday, the Prime Minister was sitting on the Front Bench. His ambition was to win the general election. Standing at the Dispatch Box was the Chancellor. His ambition is to win the leadership of the Labour party. He has his own agenda and needs to convince Labour Back Benchers that he is on their side. That is why the Budget conflicts with the Prime Minister's promises: the Prime Minister made promises to appeal to the British electorate, and the Chancellor breaks them to appeal to the Labour selectorate.

The Government believe in slick presentation and think that it is more important than keeping their promises. They think that they can tell us that black is white, spending is saving and taxes are good for us. They say that they want to encourage pension provision and they put a £500-million-a-year tax on pension funds. They say that they are the friends of business and they put nearly £20 billion of tax on business. They say that they are really country folk at heart and then slap the best part of £1 billion of extra taxes on motor fuel and gasoline, and believe that they can buy off rural anger by insulting people with £50 million for rural buses over three years. They say that this is a Budget for women and children, but they create a situation in which up to 500,000 women and children could lose £40 a week.

This Budget betrays the Government's pledges to middle Britain, it betrays their promise to reduce spending on the welfare state and it betrays the golden economic legacy that we bequeathed them. The Chancellor may have seen the waving Order Papers yesterday, but the people of this country will see the bills of his Budget landing on their doorstep in the months and years to come.

5.5 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): The official Opposition seem to have gone into a paradox and a paradigm of denial. [HON. MEMBERS: "Which?"] It is both. First, the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) cannot remember the poll tax. Then he can remember only that the Conservative Government replaced it, as though they had inherited it from the Opposition. Now, having forgotten the introduction of the poll tax, the Opposition have forgotten the instruments with which they imposed it. They followed that up this afternoon with the most wonderful denial of all—they pretended that we started the process of reducing the married couples' allowance and mortgage interest relief at source, when it was them. Then they invent a new research project in 24 hours that proves that the British people are not on average £250 per family better off, with the lowest 20 per cent. on average £500 better off, but that everyone is worse off.

Suddenly, all the things that happened yesterday are no more. This is an entirely new political stance. It is not simply a caricature of the Government's position, but a terrible dilemma—waking up in the night, sweating and thinking, "I wish I had introduced those policies," and then remembering that one is in opposition and has to go on the "Today" programme to denounce them. Is the right hon. Gentleman against the policies or in favour of them? Is he envious of them or contemptuous? We are not absolutely sure.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): We are.

Mr. Blunkett: No doubt during the debate the hon. Gentleman will be able to tell us exactly what the shadow Chancellor actually believes in. Is he in favour of the cut in corporation tax? Is he in favour of the cut in corporation tax for small companies and the cut in employers' national insurance for the lower paid and for all employees? Is he in favour of the cut in capital gains tax on long-term investment? Is he in favour of the cut that the Chancellor has already made in value added tax on fuel?

Mr. Gibb: Of course the Opposition are in favour of the cut in corporation tax. It was the Conservative party that brought down the rate of corporation tax from 52 to 33 per cent. However, we are against the big rises in the burden of corporation tax that this Government have imposed on business in their two Budgets since 1 May.

Mr. Blunkett: As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor pointed out in his brilliant presentation yesterday, we have cut corporation tax to its lowest ever level. So this not hearing, not thinking, not seeing and then denying seems to be becoming a terrible habit.

[Mr. Blunkett]

Let us face it industry and commerce know better about what they feel and think than Opposition Members. That is why the British Chambers of Commerce have said:

"This is a valuable Budget for enterprise and employment. It is both prudent and positive."

I will give way to the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) so that he can explain why he does not believe that they are right.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood): The Secretary of State wants a little clarity. I wonder whether he can clear up one thing that was left unclear at the end of yesterday. During the Budget speech, the Chancellor said first that an extra £100 million would be allocated to tackle the skills gap. Later, he said that an "additional £250 million" would be allocated for education—those are his words, not mine. Arithmetic suggests that that would be £350 million for the Secretary of State's Department. However, when we consult the Red Book in the name of the Financial Secretary, we see that the Secretary of State will get not £350 million as the Chancellor announced at 4 pm yesterday, but £250 million. I would be grateful if the Secretary of State could clarify whether the Chancellor or the Financial Secretary is right.

Mr. Blunkett: One thing that is certain is that it is £250 million more than the Opposition would have allocated. I am always delighted to give way, because I am not afraid of the Opposition in the way that they appear to be afraid of us. It is £250 million for education and skills that will be spent in addition to the £2.25 billion that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has earmarked for education since the general election. He has been able to do that precisely because, as the shadow Chancellor said this afternoon, we have done better than the Opposition expected. That is praise indeed, and I hope that he will not be churlish. He should congratulate us and say that he is delighted with our performance so far, and that they are finding it difficult to lay a finger on us or undermine what we are doing.

The bulk of the British people would want to congratulate us on the Budget. After all, its three key pillars are: work—making sure that people are in work and that work pays; enterprise—enabling small, medium and large businesses to flourish; and reinforcing and supporting children and the family.

Mr. John Townend (East Yorkshire): If the burden of taxation on companies was coming down year on year, I would congratulate the right hon. Gentleman, but will he confirm that there will no benefit from reductions in taxation until after 2000? Page 18 of the Red Book shows that companies will pay £1.6 billion extra in 1999–2000 as a result of the quarterly payment of corporation tax. In 2001, they will pay another £2 billion, and only £700 million will be offset by corporation tax reductions. Even in that year, the overall burden of corporate taxation will rise by £1.3 billion.

Mr. Blunkett: I did not hear the hon. Gentleman denounce the British Chambers of Commerce. I think that he may be the chairman of a Back-Bench committee; if so, he understands the system that applies in other developed nations. The introduction of a phased quarterly payment system inevitably means a phased-in approach and a carry-over point.

The reason why business and commerce are enthusiastic about what we are doing is precisely because the Chancellor is underpinning a long-term strategy to ensure that this country will never again have the boom-bust that the previous Government inflicted on us. A so-called boom 10 years ago led to the most enormous bust in term of people's jobs, livelihoods, homes and fears, and the large-scale unemployment from which we are only now recovering.

I would have hoped that the Conservatives would congratulate us on reaching the level of unemployment that we bequeathed to them. The new unemployment figures today show a further 14,000 off the claimant count and that we have got back to the position of June 1980. Some 150,000 people gained jobs in the final quarter of last year, an acceleration of what was happening before the general election. We will support long-term policies to ensure that that continues.

I want to ask the shadow Chancellor some simple questions, and I will be happy to give way to him if he wants to answer. Does he support the measures that we have taken to make work pay? Does he support the working families tax credit scheme and child care disregard, about which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security will say more tomorrow? Does he support our measures to ensure that the taper is gentler, so that people do not lose out when they take jobs? Two thirds of people who experience the 70 per cent. taper will be better off because of the measures taken yesterday which will genuinely make work pay. Above all, does he support the new deal, which is all about preparing people for the world of tomorrow and equipping them with confidence, skills, social experience and the expectation of having a job?

I ask those questions because I understand that, in an interview in The Independent on Sunday the shadow Chancellor was asked such questions and, in talking about the Conservatives' attitude, said that a "debate at this point would be bad for our party."

I do not know whether it is bad for his party but I should have thought that the new deal was good for young people.

To paraphrase the television advert, there may be the odd person who is mad enough to be against the new deal. There may be a couple of people—the Leader of the Opposition and the shadow Chancellor—who are misguided enough to be against it. When they get to a sect of 10 they may think that there is a cult against it. When they get beyond the membership of the Tory party, say 1,000, it is such a movement that it is difficult to be against it. When there are 100,000, it is a revolution and the Tory party will change its mind to be in favour of it.

The shadow Chancellor must come clean. Will he, in a fortnight's time, take on the challenge? Will he or the Conservative party in Smith square take on a new deal youngster? If they took on rehabilitating the Leader of the Opposition, they would have a lifetime job—no danger of losing it after only six months.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that the new deal will be paid for entirely by a one-off windfall tax, and that the number of long-term unemployed has decreased greatly in the past six months? How long does he expect that reduction to go on for, and what will pay for the new deal when unemployment starts to rise?

Mr. Blunkett: I had hoped that the hon. Gentleman would welcome the challenge and say that he would take someone on in his office as a gesture of good will. He makes a serious point, which I shall answer. Of course the new deal is being paid for from the windfall tax; everyone knows that. The shadow Chancellor condemned the windfall tax. On 3 July last year, he suggested that the windfall tax would either be bad for consumers because it would put prices up or bad for shareholders because, if the regulator held prices down, shares would fall. He was wrong on both counts. Prices have fallen in each of the affected industries, and the share price has gone up by 23 per cent. The FTSE index is now at 5,800—1,000 above what it was on 3 July when he made that suggestion.

The intention is to ensure that people are prepared for long-term jobs and have the social skills needed. That is why the Chancellor yesterday announced a series of new measures that will enable us to carry our programme forward, making it possible to ensure that work pays but also making it possible for us to extend what we are doing so that more people can benefit from the new deal. Another £100 million will be devoted in the next two years to ensuring that 70,000 people aged over 25 will have the sort of opportunities available to those under 25. We are piloting those programmes to ensure that people can learn from them and gain skills.

There is £50 million to extend the gateway. Whatever the Opposition are against, they should never be against preparing people for meaningful work through social and educational skills. A substantial part of the extra £50 million will be used to make it possible to help those in the greatest difficulty, those facing particular problems in their lives. They would be expected to be dependent on the welfare state unless their problems are overcome. Inevitably, they would be long-term dependent on the welfare state unless we invested in the gateway.

For the partners of those who receive jobseeker's allowance we have allocated an extra £60 million to ensure that they have the opportunities that were previously denied them. Couple that with the announcements that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security will make later this week in respect of child care. Couple that with the 12 pilot programmes—six projects from September this year and a further six a few months later—that we are initiating for disabled men and women to ensure that they can get back to work and have an opportunity to take advantage of the disregard brought in by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor.

All that is a positive programme of change for the future. It secures the long-term gains that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has already set in place through his changes to the Bank of England and with his Budget of 2 July. It is a long-term programme for a long-term Government ensuring that the economy of this country is in safe hands and that the stability we seek provides stable growth with low inflation. That is a prize worth having, and it is a prize which all of us on the Labour Benches will work to achieve.

5.20 pm

Mr. John Townend (East Yorkshire): The Budget lives up to the reputation of the Government, in that it treats the House of Commons with contempt. At one time, the contents of the Budget were revealed first to the Cabinet and then to the House of Commons. Now, the political spin doctors receive the details first and we Members of Parliament read them in the press. That is done to soften us up for bad news on Budget day, but what really annoys me is that the details are not even spun with truth—they think that in that way, when the Budget is not as bad as expected, middle England will be relieved and welcome it.

It would be churlish of me not to acknowledge that I agree with some of the contents of the Budget. We all accept that being able get more money on benefit than in work is wrong; we all want the poverty trap to be reduced and eliminated. I have always strongly believed in the concept of a balanced Budget, so I welcome the Chancellor's aspirations in that respect.

However, those are as yet only aspirations: Labour Members must not forget that, when the Conservatives were in office and Lady Thatcher was Prime Minister, we achieved a balanced Budget—indeed, we had a substantial surplus for several years. It was only when Lord Lawson started to shadow the deutschmark at DM3 to the pound and my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) joined the exchange rate mechanism that things started to go radically wrong.

I remind Labour Members that the current Chancellor was very keen that we should join the ERM, and when we came out of it, he called for us to rejoin it within a matter of weeks. I should be happier if I thought that the Chancellor believed in a balanced Budget for its own sake, but I have a sneaky feeling that his desire to join economic and monetary union and the single currency is the driving force.

My other major criticism is that the Chancellor's success in reducing the deficit is not the result of taking tough decisions and reducing the excessive level of public expenditure in this country that we have borne for some years, but the result of increasing the overall burden of taxation. Labour is reverting to type: it is, and always has been, a high-tax party. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) pointed out, the secret is given away on page 119 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report", which shows that, in the last year of the Conservative Administration, the total tax take with social security contributions was 36 per cent. of GDP, yet now the graph is going up and up, and the projections show that it will reach nearly 39 per cent. of GDP. The Labour party will preserve its record of leaving office with the overall burden of taxation higher than when it went in.

The big increase was the boost that the Government tried to hide last year by stealthily hitting private pensions and the corporate sector. The people in the front line of the main tax increases this year are motorists. Again, the Labour party has confirmed itself as the anti-motorist party par excellence. It fiddled the system: motorists expect one increase a year, but we have had two in nine months—4p the first time and 4.4p this time.

[Mr. John Townend]

Anyone who thinks that raising the tax on petrol way above the level of inflation will stop people driving cars does not understand how people live today. I do not know anybody who drives any less; they just spend less on other things, including their family. The only people who actually stop driving are poor people, especially those living in the countryside. Are those the people whom the Labour party wants to hit? Low-income car owners in my rural constituency are to be discouraged from travelling into Hull and York in their cars because of the cost, so they will be unable to get the benefit from the free museums the Chancellor favours so much. What a warped sense of priorities.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): Does not the hon. Gentleman recall that it was the Conservative party that introduced the 5 per cent. above inflation escalator? Presumably, he was critical of that, but does he agree that if you use that sort of escalator—it is now sensibly set at 6 per cent.—it is important that there is an offset in terms of a reduction in vehicle excise duty? The great pity of the Budget is that it does not contain clear proposals on that subject.

Mr. Townend: I shall deal with our position in a few minutes. Because of the distances and the infrequency of public transport that one experiences living in a small village—nearly everybody needs a car—£50 million over three years for rural transport is peanuts. Most Labour Members have probably never lived in a village, so they do not realise that, if there is only one bus a day, which is doubled to two buses a day, not only will that cost hundreds of millions of pounds across the country, but people will still need to use their cars.

The increase in petrol duty will also increase business costs. The Government say that industry should be competitive, but do they think that industry does not use petrol? Do they think that fewer goods will be delivered because they have put up the price of petrol? Will there be fewer calls by salesmen? I suggest that this is an increase too far—enough is enough. It is time that one party in the House started to speak up for the motorist. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden is listening when I tell him that we should abandon road fuel escalation and say that there should be no more increases above inflation.

Corporate car drivers are being hit yet again with another penal increase. That increase is surprising, because it hits the very people whom new Labour is always saying it wants to encourage—the managers, salesmen and entrepreneurs who are all part of middle England. What is the sop? We are going to have a £50 reduction in vehicle excise duty for small cars and clean cars, but what is small and what is clean? If it means small new cars, that will hit the poor, who mainly own older and second-hand cars.

Mr. Geraint Davies: Is the view the hon. Gentleman is expressing his personal view, or does it reflect the wider view of the Conservative party? Is it just an odd little view?

Mr. Townend: I am speaking for myself, but I would not be at all surprised if on Monday, when I go into the Lobby to vote against Labour's proposals on petrol, my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden is with me.

Mr. Geraint Davies: He does not share that view.

Mr. Townend: That is a matter for my right hon. Friend. I represent a rural constituency, and I shall fight on behalf of the motorists. Enough is enough. There comes a point when one should not go any further and, when 80 per cent. of the cost of petrol is tax, I believe that we have reached that point.

The cornerstone of the Government's Budget is the welfare-to-work package, including family tax credit and national insurance contributions reform. While the Chancellor's motives are praiseworthy, there remain many unanswered questions and some serious reservations. First, although I welcome the abolition of the national insurance entry fee—I always thought that it was nonsense—I am a little disturbed about who will meet that cost. It will hit the high-productivity, high-tech and high-wage firms that the Government claim that they want to encourage. Many firms that pay high wages operate—or are trying to operate—in the export industry, and that cost will reduce their competitiveness even further.

Secondly, as my right hon. Friend has said, the reforms were first mooted as supposedly reducing the cost of the social security budget, which was getting too big for the country to afford—it was getting out of hand. As we have heard today, far from reducing that cost, the Budget will increase it. People do not realise that the pensioners will pay for that. The Government stole £5 billion from the occupational pension funds last year in order to finance it—and it will do that this year, next year and every year. I think that that is awful. Married couples will also contribute £1 billion. That is appalling, as it signals a withdrawal of support from the institution of marriage at a time when most people believe that marriage breakdown is the major cause of many social problems.

Thirdly, I have doubts whether it should become the accepted wisdom that most mothers should work and their children should be left with child minders. I am old-fashioned enough to believe that the best environment for bringing up children is in the home with the mother as carer. As a result of the costs that we are now incurring, which will increase over time, we could reach the stage where it will cost as much to get mothers into work as it will cost to get them to look after their own children. We must consider that.

My fourth criticism is that the Government appear to have no policies designed to reduce the growing problem, not of lone parents or single mothers, but of unmarried mothers. I believe that Britain has the highest number of unmarried mothers in Europe—and that number is growing. We must address that situation and encourage young women not to have children outside marriage.

I must also ask where all the new jobs will come from. The main failure of the Budget is that it does nothing to encourage the Bank of England to reduce interest rates and the value of the pound. Indeed, the market's first reaction to the Budget was to push up the pound even further. That will cause our exporting industries to shed labour.

Despite all the incentives and the money that will be spent in an attempt to get people into work, I think that the Government will find that a significant number of people are unemployable or do not want to work—I call them the "professional unemployed". Constituencies such as mine have many such people. Unemployed people come to Bridlington from Sheffield, Leeds and Halifax, believing that it is far better to live by the seaside. They certainly do not come to Bridlington seeking work, because there is none.

I turn briefly to the other taxes in the Budget. Stamp duty on more expensive houses has been increased. That is a return to the traditional Labour taxation of envy: it is a tax on mobility. Why should executives, entrepreneurs, export salesmen—and Prime Ministers—who must move house frequently have to pay that extraordinary level of tax? Someone who buys a house for just over £500,000 must pay the Government £15,000 in tax. That is a tax on mobility, and it is wrong.

I make it clear that I have a lifetime's experience in the alcohol industry. That industry is facing difficult times because of cross-border shopping and smuggling. The Financial Secretary should not laugh, because she is responsible for that problem. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There is far too much noise in the Chamber.

Mr. Townend: Not only are the Government losing an enormous amount of revenue but, as I have warned from my own experience, organised crime is taking over the smuggling. Only last week smuggling gangs used guns in Dover. The only long-term answer to this problem—the Chancellor, who is pro-European, should realise it—is a progressive reduction in the differential between our duties and those of the French and Belgians.

Far from accepting that there is a problem and dealing with it progressively—we know that it cannot be solved in one go—the Government have made it worse by increasing duties on wine and beer yet again. The barriers came down in January 1993 and we have seen a massive increase in smuggling every year since then. Has the differential been reduced in that time? No, it has not. It has not even stayed the same: the differential on wine has increased by 18.4 per cent.

The same principle applies to tobacco. I do not smoke, but I know that, by increasing the duty on tobacco by more than 5 per cent., we will encourage more people to buy from smugglers. If people buy cheap tobacco, they will smoke more. Is it not incredible that duty is not paid on half the hand-rolled tobacco used in this country? The Government have accepted that there is a problem because they have not increased that duty this year—but they have not reduced it, either.

The Budget must be considered not in isolation, but together with the last Budget delivered nine months ago. Although I accept and support several measures, I believe that many people have done badly. Savers, pensioners and pension schemes have done badly. Companies have done badly through the windfall tax and the collection of corporation tax on a quarterly basis. Marriage has been undermined. The Budget does nothing to create jobs, as all the emphasis is on getting people to apply for jobs. The motorist has been savagely attacked and the overall burden of taxation continues to rise.

The Government's Budgets will not be judged now. Hon. Members should consider that the Budgets that receive the most cheers from their supporters on Budget day are often the ones that come home to roost. We shall judge the Budgets in two years' time according to whether unemployment, growth and taxes are higher or lower. Despite some beneficial measures, such as the reform of national insurance contributions, the whole complicated welfare-to-work package will be judged to be successful only if it gets the professional unemployed into work. I regret that I am pessimistic, because I do not think that the carrot will work without the stick.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): The House has been highly entertained by the hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Townend). He said that he had lifelong experience in the alcohol industry—which I believe explains a lot about his speech. As if that were not bad enough, he went on to blame my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary for his problem. I have been an almost lifelong teetotaller, and I have been the butt of many jokes in that regard. People say to me, "It must be terribly depressing waking up in the morning and knowing that that is as good as you will feel all day." [Interruption.] I am glad that that entertains my right hon. and hon Friends.

I have sat through 19 Budget debates in my parliamentary experience. This is probably the first one in which I have taken part. Year after year, I have listened to Conservative Members in government announcing proposals that increased the burden of taxation while claiming great credit for reducing the rate of income tax. It therefore comes a bit rich to hear the Opposition's charges against my right hon. Friends.

My right hon. Friend's speech yesterday was a tour de force. When I listened to the shadow Chancellor, I wondered why, if things were so magnificent on 1 May last year, we won a landslide victory.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) rose—

Mr. Foster: I also wondered why, if the Budget was as bad as the right hon. Gentleman said, it has been so well received in the City, by the business community and by families throughout the country. The Opposition protest too much. The language of betrayal is exaggeration in the extreme.

Mr. Lansley rose—

Mr. Foster: I shall give way in a moment.

Just before the Labour party conference last year, my right hon. Friend said that he wanted a crusade against unemployment and poverty. I know that my right hon. Friend is often accused of being ambitious, but such ambition is worthy of the brightest and best of any generation and would have united the Labour party at any time during its 90-year history. It is the reason why I joined the Labour party, and why I am so enthusiastic about the Budget, which has been the first powerful clarion call for a crusade against unemployment and poverty.

I welcome the widespread improvements offered by all the new deals. My right hon. Friends the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Education and Employment deserve credit for putting so much drive, energy and money behind those powerful new programmes. Now they are to be extended in a way that the Employment Committee—which, as the House knows, I chair—called for some weeks ago. We asked the Secretary of State to build in sufficient flexibility to respond to the changing nature of the jobs market. We pointed out that there were other groups that deserved priority.

A few short weeks later, the money and the political drive are there to extend all those initiatives. Now those aged 25 to 50 are being substantially catered for, and the over-50s are being brought into the programme. Now there is a substantial improvement to the new deal for single parents, and the new deals are being extended in various other imaginative ways. I welcome that whole-heartedly.

I promised to give way.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman, even though he has moved on a little. He criticised former Conservative Chancellors for, as he put it, increasing the tax burden while reducing the rate of income tax, although perhaps he will acknowledge that Conservative Chancellors left the tax burden as a proportion of gross domestic product unchanged, as compared with 1979. Why does the right hon. Gentleman think that it is such a triumph for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to increase the burden of taxation while not reducing the rate of income tax?

Mr. Foster: It is a triumph for the Chancellor to increase the burden of taxation and to receive accolades from the electorate for doing so. That was what the Opposition achieved over 18 years, which irritated and frustrated me greatly at the time.

The new deal is being extended considerably and is entirely welcome. If we are to get large numbers of single parents into work, which is what I want, the child care package is crucial. I am glad that my right hon. Friends have recognised that. However, if single parents are not to be locked into the low-wage, part-time, temporary sector of the jobs market, we must write into the single parents' new deal a substantial education and training option. At least 40 per cent. of single parents have no qualifications. We need to enhance their employability and earning capacity, if we want to make it worth their while to get a job.

The new deals would not have been introduced by the Conservatives. They still do not know whether to support the programme. The programme to make work pay would not have been initiated by them. I pay tribute to the shadow Chancellor because of the imaginative work that he did to reform the welfare state. Incidentally, most of that was pretty punishing to groups of needy people, but he did tackle the problem.

We have moved on a little further. The concept of making work pay is an exciting one. It will be extraordinarily difficult to pull off, because the complexities of the barriers to work for various groups of people are beyond the majority of Members of Parliament and perhaps beyond many civil servants to negotiate. I am certain that making work pay will be as crucial to modernising the welfare state as the high and stable level of employment written into the White Paper of 1944 was to the proper funding of the welfare state when it began.

I have signed up whole-heartedly to the concept of increasing the number of employable people, not just because it is good for them and good for society, but because it makes economic sense. The pool of employable people will bear down on inflation and allow the Chancellor to run the economy at a higher rate of growth than would otherwise have been the case. As Professor Layard said in his evidence to the Employment Committee, the net result of that should be a net increase in jobs.

Another group who deserve priority are those who are already in work. Some 80 per cent. of the work force over the next decade are already in work. My right hon. Friends are missing a trick, because there is a far greater and earlier payback to the Government from enhancing the productivity of those who are already in work than there will be from increasing the employability of those who will move into work. We must do both.

Moreover, although the schools agenda has greater political saliency and may have more profound effects in the long term, within the realistic life of the Government—say, within the next decade—there is a greater return if we invest in the people who are already in work.

In the next Budget, I shall look for tax breaks for companies to invest in training. If we are not going down the levy route, we must make it worth while for companies to invest in training. I shall explain why.

I have cited before the case of House Thorn Lighting, in Spennymoor in my constituency, whose managing director said, "We discovered that with every pair of hands we got a free brain." That expression highlights the problem that we are trying to solve: we do no more than scratch the surface of the skill and creativity of our work force. It is the companies that are the most adaptable, flexible and able to respond quickly to market situations that release the creativity of their work force and make them partners in the management of change and in improving productivity and quality. Thorn Lighting does that, as does another company in the north-east.

Nissan spends 7 per cent. of its turnover on training. The average for British industry is below 1 per cent., and for French and German companies it is between 2 and 3 per cent. It is small wonder that, in 14 years, Nissan has made itself the most efficient motor manufacturer in Europe. If we are to make an impact on our competitiveness—which we must—over the next five to 10 years, this is where the greatest return will be made. I urge my right hon. Friend to pursue strongly his lifelong learning agenda, and to remain strongly in favour of encouraging business to train those who are already in work.

The hon. Member for East Yorkshire and the shadow Chancellor referred to the high pound, which is a severe problem for most of Britain's manufacturing industry. I hope that there is not an enclave of people in the Treasury who still believe that a high pound is good for British industry—that, as a strong currency was good for Germany and Japan, British industry should have to live with the overvalued pound. Such people forget that Germany and Japan achieved a high currency through economic efficiency and economic strength. While those were being built up, they did not have to cope with the problems of an overvalued currency.

It seems clear that the Monetary Policy Committee will have to raise interest rates. If that is the case, short-term funds will flow into the pound, raising it even further. Some, including the Manufacturing Science and Finance union, warn that 100,000 jobs may be at risk because of the overvalued pound, so we must take the matter seriously. I read that those at No. 10 and No. 11 Downing street do take it seriously, and that they are rather worried about the problem. It is about time that they started to do something about it, because if we lose 100,000 jobs over the next 12 months, it will undermine all the new deals, making work pay and the modernisation of the welfare state.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): What the right hon. Gentleman is saying goes to the heart of the Chancellor's Budget judgment. I put it to the right hon. Gentleman that he is saying that, because of the Budget judgment, the City expects interest rates to rise, and that that is why the exchange rate has firmed since the Budget, giving rise to his fears about unemployment. What he just said is a fundamental attack on the Chancellor's Budget.

Mr. Foster: I am pointing out to the Chancellor what many of us know to be true in our constituencies: unless we begin to take seriously the overvalued pound and find some way of dealing with it, it will hit us in the face later this year or next, and could undermine our entire economic strategy. Therefore, it should be taken seriously.

For the past 40 or 50 years, successive Chancellors have tried to discover an economic strategy in which exports and investment drive forward growth. For a while after we had been blasted out of the exchange rate mechanism—much to the pleasure of some Opposition Members—it seemed as though the Conservative party had stumbled into a half-competent economic strategy: exports forged ahead and interest rates fell. Now we have the opposite problem. The question is, where are the jobs to come from?

We may end up with a large pool of employable people who are job-ready but without jobs to go to. We must take that seriously, because if we succeed in making people employable and enhance their ability to go straight into work, they will be severely disillusioned if there is no work for them.

We cannot look to exports to drive growth. Despite the enormous amount that my right hon. Friends have done to encourage business investment, which is why the Budget has been welcomed by the business community, I cannot see that, on the brink of even a mild recession, business investment will drive growth. So what can we look to? Perhaps we should look to public investment—perhaps to the private finance initiative.

Perhaps at last the PFI will spring into life. I read in the Red Book that there are only £1.5-billion-worth of signed deals this year, and that next year there should be £3-billion-worth of signed deals. With PFI and conventional public investment, growth is still not as high as it was a couple of years ago. The PFI will not drive growth. Perhaps conventional public investment will, but it is reducing and is planned to reduce still further, according to the Red Book.

It is time for my right hon. Friends to begin to take seriously the problems of the definition of the PSBR. I shall explain why. Let us take Newcastle airport. It is a successful airport in a rapidly growing industry—tourism. It is wholly owned by the local authorities. The commercial banks are bending over backwards to lend money to develop the airport on the strength of its balance sheet or its assets. That investment would immediately produce jobs in the construction industry in the north-east, where we badly need them. Ultimately, it would produce jobs at the airport, too. It would enhance the competitiveness of a regional airport in a rapidly expanding industry. What can be more sensible than to invest in it?

However, because the airport is wholly owned by the local authorities, it falls foul of the PSBR regulations. Such investment would amount to further borrowing by central Government and is therefore disallowed. None of our European competitors treat such investment in that fashion. It is not required by the Maastricht criteria, so why do we have the most restrictive PSBR regulations in Europe? They were introduced, I believe, in 1976, when we had to bring in the International Monetary Fund. It is time that we reviewed them.

We could invest not only in Newcastle and Teesside airports but in the Post Office. The Post Office is longing to be liberated by commercial investment so that it can respond to its own rapidly expanding market in a changing marketplace. I know that my right hon. Friends will not be able to respond to my remarks immediately, but I want to open up the debate. Let us look again at the PSBR regulations to see whether there is a way to fuel growth by sensible investment of this nature.

My constituency contains 600 square miles of rural territory. I wrote to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor last Friday to urge him to introduce compensatory measures to offset increases in petrol prices. We are trying to make work pay for the working poor in the countryside, but increased transport costs are a great deterrent. I asked my right hon. Friend to reduce vehicle excise duty on the basis of post codes in rural areas, although I am not bothered how that should be done.

I urge Treasury Ministers to take the problems of rural areas far more seriously. I welcome what they have done, and spending the £50 million on imaginative public transport schemes in rural areas would be a good investment. However, the extra money will disappear if it is spread thinly over existing services.

I make a final plea to Treasury Ministers: £50 million is welcome, but it only scratches the surface of the problem of making work pay for the working poor in rural areas. I make a clarion call for a crusade against unemployment and poverty. I eagerly look forward to future Budgets that will drive ahead with such a crusade so that we become a far more civilised society.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): I am delighted to speak after the right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster), who made a thought-provoking speech that hon. Members will have enjoyed. He and I correspond almost daily: we share surnames and initials and are for ever passing on misdirected post to each other.

I agree with many of the points made by the right hon. Gentleman and support what he said about the widening of eligibility criteria for the new deal. He was right to stress the importance of training, and used Nissan as an example. I hope that Ministers listened to him carefully.

The right hon. Gentleman was more provocative about other issues. He was right: we must do more about the vital issue of job creation, and should not just talk about job readiness. Having got people ready for jobs, there must be jobs for them to go to. I agree with him about the controversial issue of redefining the public sector borrowing requirement. The construction industry would benefit from such a redefinition, as would other sectors. Most student loan is repaid as debt, so if it were not treated as part of the PSBR, additional funds would be released for investment in that sector.

The right hon. Gentleman's most controversial remarks were about the pound. He may have upset Treasury Ministers—especially the Chief Secretary, who spent a great deal of time on "Newsnight" last night trying not to make remarks similar to the right hon. Gentleman's remark about the pound being overvalued. Hon. Members will have noted the right hon. Gentleman's honesty.

I join the right hon. Gentleman in giving qualified support for the Budget, which is in the right direction. Unlike the official Opposition, I am honest enough to say that we welcome some aspects of it, fundamentally disagree with certain measures and are disappointed by others. Pensioners could have been given additional support to tackle the serious problem of pensioner poverty. The Chancellor rightly made more resources available for children and had the opportunity to do the same to deal with the plight of the elderly.

This morning's edition of The Guardian quotes a pensioner, who said:

"I was hoping for a decent hike in the old age pension, especially when he said he was increasing child benefit by 20 per cent.—mind you, at my age I should have known better."

It is a pity that he thinks that way. Our alternative Budget offered to increase the over-80s pension supplement from 25p a week to £5 a week, which would have helped the oldest and poorest pensioners.

We are also anxious about the environment. We welcome the £50 million of support for rural transport, but many cuts in rural transport occurred because local authority budgets had been cut. Although the boost to public transport in rural areas is welcome, it will simply make up for local council cuts.

The Government have made two significant and worrying U-turns. First, the Labour manifesto claimed:

"We will lead the fight against global warming through our target of a 20 per cent reduction in carbon dioxide emissions by the year 2010", but paragraph 5.28 of the Red Book—on page 72—makes clear that the Chancellor is committing the Government only to the European Union's target of an 8 per cent. carbon dioxide emissions reduction by 2010.

I particularly look forward to hearing the Government's comments on their second U-turn. In 1994, the Labour party, when in opposition, promised an environmental Green Book to accompany the financial Red Book. The Financial Secretary reiterated the promise when she said:

"We have every intention of keeping that promise from the first full Budget."—[Official Report, 10 July 1997; Vol. 297, c. 1062.]

Sadly, that promise has been broken. Instead of a book, which should have had several pages at least, we have only one green page—page 78—in the Red Book.

It is not surprising that the Government broke their promise; the Budget does so little for the environment that there is little with which to fill a Green Book. The Budget contains a modest energy efficiency scheme; there is no carbon tax; there has been backsliding on CO_2 emissions; and fuel duties still represent tax rises—they have not been used to bring about a switch from vehicle excise duty as we recommended.

Cuts in VED are referred to, but there are no details about how they would work. The Liberal Democrats proposed a £10 VED rate for cars up to 1,600 cc to compensate for petrol price increases, whereas the Chancellor's measures will, as the right hon. Gentleman rightly pointed out, leave motorists in rural and other areas worse off. No wonder Charles Secrett, director of Friends of the Earth, said:

"This Budget is about as green as a smog alert."

We have other worries. For example, we are disappointed that the anomaly of differential two-tier tax rates on insurance products has been resolved by raising VAT for both to 17.5 per cent. We are worried about higher rates of stamp duty and believe that they could be especially harmful for people such as widows in high-price housing areas who want to trade down to smaller houses. The increase in stamp duty from £5,000 to £10,000 will be difficult for them.

We welcome many features of the Budget, not least the measures to help small businesses and tighten up on offshore trusts. We welcome measures to tackle unemployment, not least through the boosting of skills—and changes in national insurance contributions. We welcome the introduction of a fiscal responsibility code, which—rather like the independent Bank of England—was first proposed by the Liberal Democrats. We welcome measures to provide attendance allowances for women. That is another move that Liberal Democrats proposed some time ago. We are delighted not only that the Government have accepted our proposal, but that they have now accepted that it should be backdated. They did not agree with that last July.

As I have said, we welcome the extension of eligibility for the new deal. We welcome the plans that will reverse the Government's earlier proposals for independent savings accounts, personal equity plans and tax-exempt special savings accounts; and, of course, we welcome the fact that, judging by this one, Budgets seem to be starting to plan for the long term. We broadly welcome the Government's ambitious welfare reform package—particularly their introduction of a new system of tax credits, including much-needed child care improvements and a sizeable shift in the tax burden to help the least well off.

I was disappointed by the reaction of the shadow Chancellor, the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), who is not in the Chamber now. He made it clear that he did not favour redistribution. Indeed, we gain the impression from the comments of some Labour Members that they are not particularly interested in redistribution.

Mr. Tony McNulty (Harrow, East): Name one.

Mr. Foster: The Prime Minister would be a good example, in view of some of his remarks. Liberal Democrats, at least, welcome the redistribution proposals in the Budget and welcome the principle of redistribution.

I shall ask Ministers two questions about the welfare reform package. First, why is the cut in lone parent benefits, against which we have argued vociferously, to be made in the near future while the offsetting benefits that are due to be introduced through working families tax credit will not reach pay packets until April 2000? We urge the Government yet again to consider whether they wish to proceed with that cut.

Secondly, I wonder whether the Chancellor is aware of information given by the Institute for Fiscal Studies in a post-Budget presentation today. The institute points out that, although 1.1 million people will have better work incentives as a result of the working families tax credit and other measures, some 2.8 million will have worse incentives. According to the institute—the point was also made, rightly in my view, by the shadow Chancellor—it will now be impossible to predict the net effect of the measures on employment. It is impossible to say whether jobs will be created in the way that both the right hon. Gentleman and I consider vital.

The Budget contains some measures that we may welcome in principle, but which we do not think go far enough. We believe that there are three reasons why the Government have not allowed themselves to go as far as they should have. First, they have agreed—wrongly, in our view—to stick to Tory spending limits. At least, that is what they said up until yesterday: they told us that they would stick to the overall control total for 1998-99. Those who analyse the Red Book, however, will discover that the Government have broken the clear promise that they made to the House—although it is one of the broken promises that Liberal Democrats welcome.

The second problem that has constrained the Chancellor and the Government is their refusal to consider raising the level of personal income tax. As has been pointed out, the Government have raised taxation overall in their package, but what has been raised is regressive taxation, not—as we would have liked—progressive taxation. The Government's failure to consider raising income tax levels means that they have no mechanism with which to control the current consumer boom and its effect on the economy.

The third problem is the Government's continued uncertainty about our membership of the European currency. It was no surprise to read today that the pound had reached a nine-year high, which threatens to create problems for our exporters and to lead to higher interest rates. With no controls on either our membership of the European currency or the ability to raise income tax, the pound will be left bobbing around, out of control.

Those constraints, with the Government's apparent determination to build up a war chest of money that they will be able to spend in the few years running up to the next general election—it is currently estimated that it will amount to £123 billion by the end of the Parliament—mean that the Budget has simply not gone far enough, especially in relation to public services. The extra cash for health and education falls far short of what is needed: it is just a drop in the ocean.

The trouble is—the Chancellor did not mention this in his speech—that the extra money he announced was largely offset by the upward revision of inflation, which means the cutting of about £750 million from real public spending next year. That cancels out almost all the spending increases announced by the Chancellor. It also means that the black hole in the Government's finances caused by higher inflation has cut a massive £6.8 billion from the real value of public spending plans for 1998–99, which are now well behind the proposals of the last Conservative Chancellor.

I shall now mention two aspects of public spending that I consider particularly important. The first is health. We heard much about the Government's commitment to health in today's statement by the Secretary of State for Health and, as hon. Members will remember, the Labour party's manifesto for the last election said:

"We will rebuild the NHS . . . cut NHS waiting lists by 100,000".

Since then, the pledge has been somewhat watered down. In yesterday's Budget statement, we heard that the NHS would have an additional £500 million, but that is much less than the £2.25 billion that we said was necessary in our alternative Budget. Furthermore, with the higher GDP deflator hidden away in the Red Book, the amount available to the NHS will be worth nearer to £400 million in real terms.

Given the pressure on the Budget caused by inflation rate trends in the NHS and the millennium computer time bomb problem, it is worrying that the Chancellor seems to believe that that amount will be enough to cut waiting lists in the way described by the Prime Minister today at Prime Minister's Question Time. We do not think it will be possible.

To sum up my views about the situation in the NHS:

"Opposition Members welcome any additional resources for the national health service and any plan to break down the appallingly high waiting lists. However . . . When health costs are rising faster than even ordinary inflation, the sum that the Chancellor has provided today will barely cover the basic inflationary pressures that the health authorities face, far less deal with their huge backlog of structural repairs."—[Official Report, 1 November 1988; Vol. 139, c. 826.]

Those are not my words; they were spoken by the current Chancellor nearly 10 years ago, when his party was in opposition. What he said 10 years ago we believe today about what this Government are offering to the health service.

We remember the Government's commitment to make education their number one priority. They also told us that it was their intention that the share of GDP spent on education would rise over the lifetime of a Parliament. With the Chancellor's announcement, unfortunately, they are not making any progress on that promise. The share of GDP has hardly altered over previous years. In fact, if anything, it has made a small downward movement.

The question is whether the education proposals will deliver much at all. According to the spin doctors, who had a field day up to and including yesterday, much is going to happen, but when the £250 million—that, of course, is in comparison with our Budget proposals for £2.5 billion—was announced, the Chancellor did not mention the effects of the upward revision of inflation.

Because the increase in inflation affects the entire education budget, the net extra that yesterday's Budget offers for education is, in fact, only £148 million. Of that, £100 million will go to the new skills programme and £10 million to education action zones, both of which we welcome—but that leaves only £38 million extra for our schools. We welcome that, but, frankly, it is not very much.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): Does my hon. Friend agree that the Budget announcement—and, indeed, the announcement of the Secretary of State for Education and Employment—included no resources whatever to support the learning age? The idea that we can build lifelong learning in the next millennium on absolutely no resources is hypocritical—sorry, I should not use that word. It is misguided.

Mr. Foster: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. I do not know whether he noted that, when the announcement came about the small extra amo,unt of money for education, and it was made clear that there was no extra money for further or higher education, we also had an announcement that there was to be a continuation of the Oxbridge colleges' money. For a Government who concern themselves with providing for the many and not the few, that seemed bizarre.

As my hon. Friend knows only too well, there is a desperate need for additional money in higher education. Sir Ron Dearing, for example, said that, if we are to address the falling qualities of libraries, teaching facilities and especially information technology, we need £365 million this year, £575 million next year and £1 billion by 2000. The Government have, in practice, offered no new money in the Budget. Before it, they offered £165 million, of which £40 million is to improve access, and they will top-slice higher education budgets by £150 million by reclaiming the new tuition fee element.

As the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Ms Morris) will know, the £165 million is not new money; it comes simply from staging Higher Education Funding Council grant payments so that the Government make a saving.

The House may be interested to know that Baroness Blackstone said:

"I have tried to say as clearly as I can that we are committed to trying to find additional funding for universities."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 10 March 1988; Vol. 587, c. 188.]

It is clear from yesterday's Budget that the Government have failed in their effort to find additional funds for universities. Sadly, they have failed also to find any additional money for further education. Baroness Kennedy recently commented that our Cinderella further education sector needed

"a sustained and massive investment in tackling the backlog of underachievement in the population to create a self-perpetuating learning society".

The reality from yesterday's Budget is that no additional money is to go into the further education sector.

There is some additional money for our schools and for skills, both of which are welcome, but there is no additional money for further or higher education. There is no opportunity, then, to start to address some of the problems that need to be tackled in our education service.

Yes, the Government are committed to reducing primary class sizes for key stage 1 pupils, but we argue that we should reduce class sizes for all primary school children. There is little or no additional money to help tackle the backlog of repair and maintenance work in schools. There is no opportunity to start to put in place early-years education for three as well as four-year-old children whose parents want it.

There is no opportunity to start to introduce a cap on technology and science class sizes in secondary schools, or significantly to increase the amount of money for books and equipment in schools. There is no additional money really to tackle the problems that I have described in further and higher education and, in particular, to start to give some support to part-time students in both further and higher education. This Budget has moved in the right direction, and for that we welcome it, but it has disappointed in a number of sectors, not least in funding for higher and further education.

Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): I have listened intently to what the hon. Gentleman has said. Before he finishes, will he perhaps undertake that his Liberal Democrat colleagues will turn up this year during the Standing Committee stage of the Finance Bill and go through the detailed work of criticising and amending the Budget—making the points that he has been making in detail—rather than, as last year, contributing 15 minutes out of the 26 hours of debate, which was undertaken mostly by Conservative Members? The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), the Liberal Democrat spokesman, appeared for just 30 minutes in the whole week.

Mr. Foster: I am certainly not going to make any commitments on behalf of my hon. Friends. They can make commitments for themselves. Earlier today, one Conservative Member told us what his views were and, when asked whether he was speaking for himself or the party, pointed out that he was speaking for himself. We then heard the shadow Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), say that that is the way in which Conservatives always speak, so I shall let my hon. Friends speak for themselves as well.

We welcome the direction in which the Budget has gone. It has huge gaps, not least its failure to address the need to provide support for pensioners and to tackle this nation's environmental problems. We welcome a number of its measures, but argue that they simply do not go far enough. However, given that there is a movement and direction in this Budget that we support, we give it the qualified support that the right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland also gave it.

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): I offer the Chancellor of the Exchequer congratulations on introducing four extremely important principles in this Budget, which could easily be overlooked in the detailed exchanges.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend on raising child benefit. In particular, it is important that the House notes the Prime Minister's comment at today's Question Time—that a belief that tax policy should favour the child, rather than judge the household, underpinned that change. That is extremely important when we place our children in the context of the best assets that a society has. If we can recognise that as a Budget principle, we will be much the better for it.

The second thing that I wish to congratulate the Chancellor on is his decision to reduce value added tax on the installation of home insulation products. Again, it may involve a relatively small amount in actual terms—perhaps no more than an extra 40,000 properties a year are likely to benefit—but it establishes a tax principle that will be central to how we view economics in the next century. The principle is this: it is wrong for any Government to tax energy-saving more heavily than energy-consuming. Labour fought for that argument in opposition, and I am pleased to see that in government we have stuck to the principle for which we argued, and made the decision to reduce VAT on home insulation products.

Mr. Loughton: On that point, will the hon. Gentleman admit that the Government have reneged on the campaign that the Financial Secretary to the Treasury led two years ago, in that the VAT reduction applies only to grants from local authorities, not to energy-efficient goods in general, which anyone here, even the Lord Chancellor, could go down to B and Q tomorrow and buy?

Mr. Simpson: No; I think that we are at the first stage of a process that will move the whole eco-taxation agenda on to a significant point. It will profoundly shift the way in which we think about the relationship between taxation, economics and the environment, and I am pleased that we have made that start.

That fits in with the third factor on which I congratulate the Chancellor—the beginnings of a framework of green taxation. Spirited as was the defence by the hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Townend) of the rights of the private motorist, if we are to continue to exist on a planet and in an environment that will sustain us all, we must face the consequences of Kyoto. The principles of contraction and convergence that came out of the Kyoto agreement will force us all down a path which not only will mean that we take seriously our responsibilities for environmental taxation, but will probably become the central pillar of taxation policy for the 21st century.

Finally, I thank the Chancellor for issuing a pre-Budget consultation document. Many of us complained for years that the House was not taken seriously during the process of Budget formulation and consideration. This year—for the first time to my knowledge—a Chancellor has published a pre-Budget report, and invited contributions and responses.

I assumed that that invitation included me, and I had the temerity to submit my own Budget to my right hon. Friend about a week ago. Not much of it appeared in the Budget statement yesterday, but I am certain that the Chancellor has tucked it up his sleeve and is ready to unfold it in the next Budget, or perhaps later this year.

I shall describe some of the "big picture" issues against which the Budget must be measured, which the House has not properly addressed so far. Those focus on three factors—the real prospect of a recession, the case to be made for a reflationary and reinvestment programme, and the relationship between work and welfare.

When I wrote my Budget submission, I was greatly influenced by several commentators who had written about the changes that had taken place in the global economy over the past year. Those range from—before the Budget—people such as Robert Reich, the former American Secretary for Labour, to—after the Budget—Roger Bootle, one of the most senior economists and commentators in the United Kingdom.

Neither of those is a known member of the "usual suspects" group in the parliamentary Labour party, but each warns that the world is sitting at the edge at a large unco-ordinated global contraction, of which we have seen only the beginnings. To retain a monetarist obsession with the risks of inflation is to flirt with the real danger of missing the next war, because the serious challenge we face is the risk of an unco-ordinated global recession.

In that context, we must address some of the contradictions that one finds in almost every modern economy, such as the signs of boom and the signs of bust appearing at the same time—a boom in consumer spending and credit debt, co-existing with a bust in manufacturing output and manufacturing investment.

Those are new and difficult problems for any Chancellor and any Government to deal with, but deal with them we must. The likelihood is that the consequences already being seen to follow from the Budget statement will accelerate rather than delay the point at which the contradiction will have to be dealt with.

The value of the pound has already increased today. That makes it almost certain that, when the Monetary Policy Committee meets, it will raise interest rates. The fall in manufacturing and manufacturing investment that will follow will add to the Budget predictions for manufacturing industry, which have been downgraded from a presumption of 1.5 per cent. growth this year to an assumption of growth between 0 and 0.5 per cent.

That is all likely to come through in the second half of this year, when the welfare-to-work programme will be producing people who are at the point of looking for work. We shall face a real problem if employers are having to make decisions about whether they can retain existing employees, at the same time that we as a Government are asking them to take on the new trainees and recruits coming through the welfare-to-work programme. At that point we will be asked serious questions about where the work is to be found.

When the Institute of Fiscal Studies said that, out of this year's Budget, it would be possible for us to release between £3 billion and £3.5 billion for public investment, it was being excessively cautious. The real figure, as the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) said, is probably more; between £5 billion and £10 billion could have been released. That reinvestment is what we need for a publicly led and publicly financed programme to deliver real jobs in the real economy.

I looked at several of the newspapers this morning, and saw that one of them announced that the Chancellor had declared war on the work-shy. If we can inspire young people and others among the long-term unemployed to go into the welfare-to-work programme, and if we give them the skills to enable them to participate and the enthusiasm to seek permanent work, where will that work be found, if the economy is on the point of a serious and possibly sustained downturn?

I believe profoundly in our new deal proposals. There is nothing more important for a society than finding productive, secure and well-paid work. Yet, in the broader economic context in which the new deal is having to be framed, it may be difficult for us to deliver on that. I draw a comparison with the previous and probably better known "new deal" introduced by President Roosevelt after his victory in America in 1932. There are significant factors in what underpins each of the two approaches that are entirely different.

Under Roosevelt, the new deal programme built 651,000 miles of roads, 78,000 bridges and viaducts, and 38,000 municipal buildings; 2 million young people went into youth conservation work. The Government of the day introduced a minimum wage and price controls, regulated the financial markets and abolished child labour. Huge numbers of teachers were involved in keeping open rural schools that would otherwise have been closed on economic grounds, while the economies that supported their communities were rebuilt, underpinned and strengthened.

[Mr. Simpson]

That all took place around a presumption that public borrowing was not a carnal sin, and did not make one blind. It was the basis on which to rebuild a sensible economy. People in work were themselves tax contributors rather than welfare dependents.

The Government of the day borrowed to accomplish those goals. The issue was not whether they had debt, but where the debt was owed and how it would be used. Those are still the central issues, and will determine how we underpin a reflationary package to deliver real jobs in the United Kingdom economy.

There is no point in saying that we can leave it to the private sector. If there is one absolutely clear lesson to be learnt from the Tories' 18 years in power, it is that they gave the free market freedoms to do anything it liked, and that the one thing it did not do was reinvest massively in long-term job security in our economy. In those 18 years, our downgrading of private investment—in which the United Kingdom has always failed to meet the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development average—was made worse by the planned collapse of public investment and the planned sell-off of public assets.

When the Tories came to power in the late 1970s, net public wealth as a proportion of gross domestic product was 70 per cent. When they left power, it had been run down to 10 per cent. It was an exercise in long-term asset stripping rather than long-term reinvestment.

How will we underpin a real, serious and sustainable new deal programme? Although I do not urge that we build 651,000 miles of new roads—I am not a roads-supporting person—I remind Ministers that there is a rough equivalence in the number of houses in the UK that are miserably insulated and desperately in need of upgrading to modern home insulation standards. In the second appendix to my Budget submission, I outlined the basis on which the Government could begin the first stages of a 15-year programme to end fuel poverty in the United Kingdom.

The programme would require us to upgrade 500,000 properties a year for each of the next 15 years. Consequently, we would immediately create sustainable work for many of today's unemployed. We would also raise the quality of life of the many households who live in miserable, unhealthy accommodation. We would save money for health service, and raise the standard of the United Kingdom's capital housing stock. Environmentally, the programme would save large amounts of carbon emissions, and it would create a virtuous circle, in which all will win and none will lose. That is how we can create work, wealth and well-being.

We could also develop comprehensive national programmes to restore and rebuild public transport infrastructures in all our towns and cities, and to serve all our rural areas. However, such programmes will not be created by providing a few market incentives.

Although the £500 million provided in the Budget will be a start in developing such programmes, it will allow us—if we spread the amount over three years, across the country—only to draw up the plans, not to deliver the networks. Again, we will need a public investment-driven programme, which would underpin welfare to work and provide the arena in which we will allow people who are not work-shy to find a real and useful place in our economy.

The Chancellor, in accomplishing those objectives, may wish to examine and embrace other tax principles. One principle is very simple: a public stakeholding should be attached to every public subsidy—an interesting notion, which Conservative Governments studiously avoided in their 18 years in office. I shall develop later the point that those Governments were very good at shifting the locus of public subsidy from personal welfare towards corporate welfare.

Those who say that we should not attach conditions to public subsidies to the private sector might like to examine the United States' community reinvestment legislation, in which the private and financial sectors' social obligations are legally binding, and cover matters such as community reinvestment and not-for-profit work in local communities. Their obligation is one of demonstrating how public moneys will be used to benefit the communities from which that money is drawn.

Organisations such as Greenpeace, Friends of the Earth and the Association for the Conservation of Energy have all, in their own way, stated the colossal potential of environmental technologies and environmental repair in generating real, sustainable jobs. The sooner we seriously embrace our Kyoto obligations and an environmental agenda, the sooner we will engage in the economics of the next century.

Accepting those obligations will dovetail with some of the issues and contradictions that we will have to resolve in the transition to a welfare-to-work system. The Chancellor was absolutely right to set himself the task of reducing poverty, and particularly of reducing the outrageous marginal tax rates that fall on the poorest in the land.

Often, those who move from welfare to work face marginal tax rates of up to 96p in the pound. If they receive passported benefits—such as free school meals or school travel—the reclaim rate may amount to 117p for every 100p they earn. That is crazy. Therefore, trying to connect the benefits system with the wage system is an extremely important idea and objective.

Connecting the two systems will, however, have some real difficulties, and the House must not be deluded about them. The House attempted twice before to develop its own version of working families tax credits. On each occasion, it failed to enact workable legislation. The first problem—making the proposals complex and unworkable—was the legacy of an obsession with means-tested benefits.

The problem is not only the administrative difficulties of moving family credit from the welfare system to the work system—by means of income tax—but the relationship between whatever system eventually emerges and the remaining aspects of the means-tested benefit system. If we are left with a legacy of clawing back housing benefit and council tax rebates, we will discover that exactly the same poverty traps remain, but appear at different points. We may try to introduce different tapers and stages at which the clawbacks occur, but it will simply make a monster of the current mess.

I make those comments not to be critical of the idea of connecting the systems, but to acknowledge the scale of the complexity that we will have to sort out. If there is one possible way in which the process can be made simpler, it is by simplifying the process by retreating from means-tested benefits. The simplest way of delivering a new system would be to return to many of the Beveridge assumptions about universal platform entitlements underpinning the benefits system, and to a progressive taxation structure—however it is constructed—as the means of claiming back benefits from those, at whatever position in the earnings scale, who are deemed not to be entitled to be net beneficiaries.

Returning to those earlier assumptions would remove the barriers between welfare and work. We remove the complexities of collection not by diving into separate taxation processes on individual benefits but by taxing overall disposable income. It is called progressive income tax—[Interruption.] Yes, it is unashamedly redistributive; but that is what society should do. We cannot tackle poverty without redistribution.

The idea that poverty will right itself if there is accelerated growth is nonsense. We inherited from the previous Tory Government a wider gap between rich and poor than this country has ever seen. That is because the Tories abandoned a recognition that the market has no interest in redistributing to the poor; it becomes self-serving to the rich. A redistributive tax policy is nothing to be ashamed of.

In considering how welfare to work and the working families tax credit might fit into the redistributive process, it is important that the House looks at the lessons that must be learned from Canada and the United States before it adopts any particular structure of a scheme. The equivalent to the working families tax credit in the United States has to be underpinned by food vouchers. I have yet to see a case for embracing the reintroduction of food vouchers in the United Kingdom. In Canada, the costs of going down such a path have been extraordinarily high.

At some point, any Government must ask themselves whether the costs of fundamental change in the welfare system outweigh the specific benefits of that change. The answers are to be found in different variations on this theme: a return to universal benefits and welfare system, tax thresholds that are adjusted to take the working poor out of tax paying rather than in pursuit of a lower rate of tax, and a rise in the initial tax disregard for those entering work.

The Chancellor has been absolutely right to go down the path of raising environmental taxation. He has been absolutely right to raise the amount of support that goes directly to children. He would also have been right if he had followed the same logic and raised the amount of support that goes to pensioners and disabled people. He would also have been right if he had said that we should go down the route of directed public investment, which would be the basis of a planned reflation of the economy.

I expect that, at some point, the Tories will say that all this is unaffordable; that the welfare burden is simply unsustainable in a modern economy. I must concede that there might be one sense in which they are right. Cuts in personal welfare under their Administrations effected a shift towards corporate welfare.

Allowances for and non-taxation of industry must amount to about £30 billion a year—just over £18 billion in capital allowances, £4.5 billion in direct grants, £4.1 billion in export credit guarantees, mainly in export support grants, and a whole series of other packages. In their own way, they are all forms of welfare dependency. If the Chancellor needs to look for money, and if tough decisions are to be made, we should begin by looking at corporate welfare.

Every day of every week, the Government's spending Ministries are besieged by businesses—mainly big business—saying, "Of course we will come to your country, but we need you to pay us. We need you to put together an incentives package that will make it worth our while. We want you to build the buildings for us, give us the land, train the work force and put in the infrastructure. While you are at it, we would like you to have a word with the local authority and ask them to give us a 10-year exemption from business rates. Don't talk to us about crisis loans; we want grants." If welfare is demeaning, we should try first removing the unaffordable, unsustainable, demeaning burden on business, and allow it to stand on its own two feet.

If we do not want to do that, we should introduce conditions on the use of public money in return for the investment or non-taxation with which they are graced. The idea of a stakeholder economy ought to extend to the notion that the Government, on behalf of the people they represent, take a stake in—or hand a different form of stakeholding to—the industries that are publicly subsidised by being allowed not to pay tax as the rest of us do.

It would be interesting to invite the Home Secretary to consider the behaviour of some corporations. Rather than judging lone-parent families, we should look at the morality of some of the lone-parent corporations and their conduct around the globe. They are terribly flighty. They take money in one place, get into a relationship in one country, spawn offspring, and then do a runner to somewhere else. Someone flashes a wad of cash somewhere else, and they are off. The behaviour of lone-parent companies, which have often had multiple partners, does not make them good parents.

We ought to ask the Home Secretary whether there is a need for lone-parent company classes in parenting. We should ask whether there is a need to curfew capital; whether it should be back in the country by 9 o'clock. There are a series of ways in which we can use the assets that this country still has in abundance to meet all the needs and aspirations that are found in the Chancellor's statement and the new deal.

Nothing is more important than putting the country back to work. To do so in an environmentally sustainable way is certainly our biggest challenge. That is the really exciting agenda of the next century. If we can shift our spending from warfare to welfare, from speculation to environmental repair and reinvestment, we will find that we have all the resources necessary to deliver not only a new deal but a sustainable deal for a new century. The sooner we embrace that in a Budget, the better society will be.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): This was one of the most over-hyped, over-spun, media-spectacle Budgets that I can remember. Indeed, one is not disappointed by the two opening sentences of the Chancellor's Budget speech. It is a good idea to remind the House that he said:

> "Only once in a generation is the tax system fundamentally reformed. The Budget I bring before the House and the country today begins the task not just of modernising taxation but of modernising the entire tax and benefits system of our country."—[Official Report, 17 March 1998; Vol. 308, c. 1097.]

[Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown]

The Chancellor gives himself divine status. A previous Chancellor coined the phrase that a Budget celebrated on the day is often regretted at leisure. History will judge today's Chancellor by whether he lives up to the very high expectations that he set himself in his opening remarks.

We know that the Budget is delivered against a macro-economic climate of falling growth, rising inflation, falling unemployment and, the joker in the pack, rising money supply—at some 10 per cent. a year, which is unsustainably high. What did the Budget do? It took me some little while to discover—buried deep in the Red Book in table B.20 on page 118—that it is a fiscally tightening Budget, to the tune of £4.8 billion this year and £2.9 billion next year.

Added to the fiscal tightening in the previous Budget, through the windfall tax and advance corporation tax credits, fiscal tightening amounts this year to £11.8 billion and next year to £9.9 billion. The question is whether that will be sufficient to avoid having to increase interest rates at the next Monetary Policy Committee, bearing in mind the effect that that will have on the value of the pound.

Part of the macro-economic situation is the City's verdict on the Budget. What happened? The pound soared to a nine-year high. The group chief economist of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, Roger Bootle, said:

"It's a considerable disappointment that will put a lot of pressure on the Monetary Policy Committee to raise rates."

So the pound is likely to go still higher. As I predicted in a recent speech on the economy, manufacturing industry is already beginning to go into negative growth. If we are not careful, the economy will go into recession in two or two and a half years.

We delivered one of the brightest economic situations that this country has seen since the war. We left a golden legacy, in which growth exceeded inflation. It is a bitter disappointment that the rate of growth is falling. The Red Book predictions show it falling from 2.5 per cent. to 2 per cent. this year and to 1.75 per cent. next year, which will be unsatisfactory even if it is achieved. On the day that the Budget was delivered, the retail prices index rose disappointingly from 2.5 per cent. to 2.6 per cent.

How is the Budget to be judged? There are some welcome elements, but most of the welcome measures come with a "but". One could welcome the decrease in corporation tax for large and small companies to 30 per cent. and 20 per cent. respectively, but that has to be considered in the context of the overall burden of taxation on business, which has considerably increased because of the withdrawal of associated tax credit in the previous Budget and, perhaps more importantly, the quarterly filing of corporation tax for large companies. That will place a burden on companies.

The Chancellor made much of trying to introduce a climate in which small businesses would thrive. He said that he was trying to reduce bureaucracy, but, nine months into the Government's term of office, I see no sign of them reducing bureaucracy—quite the contrary. As I said in an intervention on my hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) yesterday, the measures that the Government are accepting from the European Commission, particularly in the social chapter, such as the decision at the recent meeting to allow works councils for small firms with fewer than 50 employees, will add considerably to the burden on small businesses.

The Budget will increase taxation as a proportion of gross domestic product. That can be seen from chart B2 on page 119 of the Red Book. The prediction is that the overall burden of taxation will be 38 per cent. next year. Given that our major economic rival, Germany, with which we compete directly in many markets, has an overall taxation burden of 39 per cent., the situation is serious. The prediction is based on some optimistic assumptions for levels of growth. If those predictions are not sustained, the level of taxation is likely to go over the magic figure of 40 per cent.

The level of Government expenditure as a proportion of GDP is also mentioned in the Red Book. That figure is also likely to go over the magic figure of 40 per cent. in the near future. With our major rivals such as the United States, Japan and Korea all having a ratio well below 40 per cent., it is bizarre that a Government who claim to be sticking to the Conservative expenditure plans are not doing so, as a detailed examination of the Red Book shows.

One of the disappointments is that the Government cannot control social security expenditure, contrary to what they are proclaiming publicly. Table B18 on page 128 shows that the social security budget is likely to rise by £4 billion over the next two years. The Government are predicting that they will not be able to stick to the expenditure plans.

I have already said that the Budget has some welcome measures, but there is always a "but". One could welcome the changes to employers' national insurance contributions. However, the overall rate of national insurance contribution for employers is rising to 12.2 per cent., placing a considerable burden on companies, largely in the high-tech and financial sector, that are the backbone of our economy and are helping our balance of payments. They will be hit by the measure.

National insurance is an odious tax. It would be more intellectually honest to abolish it and put the burden on income tax. That would be a properly progressive tax, with those who earned more paying more of their share of tax, instead of having a vastly complicated tax that takes up a lot of time for accountants and the Contributions Agency. All that could be abolished if the system were simplified. I welcome the Chancellor's decision to merge the Contributions Agency with the Inland Revenue. I also welcome the measures to ask the Inland Revenue to help new firms setting up payroll tax. Those are two positive measures.

The Chancellor largely got away with his Budget last night, and the media were on the whole satisfied with it, because he had hyped in advance that middle England—the middle classes and the opinion formers—would be hit. In the event, they were not—or were they? We might just have to wait for the small print. Those of us who know a little about such matters can already divine some of the measures that will hit the middle classes.

One might welcome the reduction of capital gains tax from 40 per cent. to 24 per cent. for assets that are held for 10 years, but let us think about that. If inflation is 2 per cent., over 10 years the asset will depreciate by 20 per cent. If, as is more likely, the rate of inflation is over 4 per cent., the asset will depreciate by 40 per cent.

In other words, the gain caused by inflation will be more than the reduction of tax that the Chancellor is making. By not allowing indexation of gains, we are going back to the bad old days of the high-inflation Governments of the 1970s, which taxed inflation on gains. That is unfair and unsatisfactory. I hope that, by the time the Finance Bill is published, the Government will have had a re-think.

Another disappointment is that, as the Red Book shows, the savings ratio has declined sharply in the past year—by about 1 per cent. It is predicted to decline again in the coming year. Is that surprising, when a retrospective tax was announced to put a lifetime ceiling on the new individual savings accounts and abolish PEPs and TESSAs? What are small savers to think when they might be taxed later? The Government are breaking faith with small savers.

It is a tribute to my right hon. Friends the Members for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) and for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) and all my hon. Friends, who have conducted a vociferous campaign, based on huge numbers of letters, that the Government have been persuaded that a lifetime limit of £50,000 on the new ISAs is discriminatory, particularly against the young, and unworkable. The Government have listened to the savings industry as well. I welcome that very much.

Mr. Loughton: A U-turn.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Indeed.

I should like to examine one or two of the largely welcome social measures in the Budget in a little detail. The working families tax credit suffers from a number of defects. The Womens Budget Group, an informal think tank of economists, social policy experts and women's organisations, believes that the replacement of family credit with the working families tax credit will lead to women and their children losing. Because the man is usually the breadwinner, he will get the tax credit, rather than it going to the woman.

The same would apply to taxing child benefit. It is often the low-earning or non-taxpaying wife who obtains the child benefit. Taxation would be calculated on the man's marginal rate. She would suffer. We welcome the increase in child benefit, but we regret that those on even basic rates of tax will suffer.

I wish to comment on the increase in petrol duty. The House of Commons estimates that the Chancellor has raised tax revenue by £1 billion this year, on top of the £695 million he raised in last year's Budget. This is a savage rise, which particularly hurts those people in rural constituencies who depend on the car for a lifeline.

People in my constituency have to use the car to get to the post office to get their benefit, to go to the doctor's surgery, and to do their basic shopping. It is all very well the Government saying that the problem is due to the previous Government's deregulation of the bus system, but there will never be a bus system in a rural area that is convenient for every single person—young, middle-aged and old. That is unrealistic. Those in rural areas need a car, and they are clobbered every time in the name of a so-called environmentally friendly tax.

There are many other more satisfactory ways of producing a green Budget. One is to reduce VAT on insulation materials. This is a so-called welcome benefit, but it is miserly because it is applied only to Government schemes. Why does it not apply across the spectrum? The Chancellor should talk to our European Community officials in Brussels to see if we can get a derogation to apply the benefit across the spectrum, so that all insulating materials can be free of VAT. In that way, instead of the home energy efficiency scheme insulating 3.5 million homes, it would get to all 10 million homes which need it, and some of the poorest people would benefit.

The real disappointment of the Budget is that it fails to deliver for the health service and for education. The Government claim that they have a wonderfully reducing debt and a strong economy, but they should listen to the figures. Let us look at the health service. The £500 million which was greeted—or was not greeted—with such glee by Government Back Benchers yesterday is 1.2 per cent. extra for the health service. When we were in government, we put in, year on year on year, 3 per cent. extra in real terms.

My constituents in Gloucestershire will see their waiting lists rise because the funding is not being increased at the same rate as for urban areas. We have a bed-blocking problem in Gloucestershire, and 100 people who should not be in hospital are there simply because the funding is not available to provide them with a domiciliary, residential or nursing care package. They are in beds which should be occupied by people who need operations. The doctors are there to perform the operations, but they cannot be carried out, because the money is not there to get the people our of hospital. The waiting lists lengthen, and people who need operations do not get them.

Ms Claire Ward (Watford): The hon. Gentleman has a selective memory of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's speech. He refers to the increase in petrol duty and its effect upon the rural communities. He forgets that the Chancellor also introduced an extra £50 million for rural transport. He referred to the health service, but he forgets that we have put more money into the health service than the Conservative Government ever intended. We have done likewise in education. I am interested to hear the—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The hon. Lady is in danger of making a speech. Interventions must be brief.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I rather wish I had not given way to the hon. Lady, but as I did, I will answer in robust terms.

The Chancellor has raised £1 billion from the extra petrol duty. The £50 million for special rural schemes transport is peanuts in comparison, and my constituents will feel the harsh economic effects of that increase in petrol tax. The £50 million is welcome, and here I make a special plea to the Chancellor. My constituency has an excellent community bus scheme, which has been going for 15 years. I hope that money will go not only to new schemes but to existing ones.

Mr. Shaun Woodward (Witney): Does my hon. Friend agree that the intervention by the hon. Member for Watford (Ms Ward) showed what we all know—that Labour Members have no understanding whatever of the needs of rural communities? Does he agree that they are given to the kind of patronising claptrap which suggests that £50 million for rural transport will solve the problems that the Government have created with their Budget?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend is right. He moves in his constituency, and he goes to the local employment service and doctors' surgeries. He knows, as I do—and as every Member who properly represents a rural community knows—the real hardship that the increase in petrol duty will cause.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford): The hon. Gentleman knows my constituency very well, and I must say that I find astonishing what he says about the great things done by the Tory Government. Does he remember the village schools, pubs, shops, postal services and bus services closed under the Tory Government? I have no great support for Labour Members who do not understand rural constituencies, but this is one issue that the Tories—who were thrown out of vast swathes of rural Britain—do not understand, either.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I was the only Conservative Member of Parliament in the country who had a positive swing towards to me at the election. I do not recall a single time when I was trying to defend a rural school or bus service on which I received support from any Liberal Democrats.

The Budget is a wasted opportunity in terms of the amount of resources going to the health service. In terms of education, the position is even worse. I calculate that the increase—even with the extra £250 million yesterday—this year will be less than 1 per cent. That is a disgrace, and experienced teachers in my constituency will continue to leave schools and class sizes will rise. Special needs pupils will not get the statementing they need.

The previous Government were able to provide great public services at the same time as reducing the burden of taxation. I hope that the Government will do better in the rest of their term. Otherwise, when they reach the next election, the electorate will deliver their verdict.

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): This is an amazing exhibition from the Opposition. In today's newspapers—from The Sun to the Financial Times and everything in between—there has been almost universal acclaim for the brilliance of the Chancellor's Budget. [Interruption.] Conservative Members may laugh, but they are in the minority. It is all very well pretending that the media do not really understand the issues—I suggest that they understand the issues much more than Opposition Members.

The centrepiece of the Budget—making work pay—goes alongside a number of other themes on which I will not dwell, as the media and right hon. and hon. Friends will articulate them in detail. I want to combat the somewhat pathetic points made by the Leader of the Opposition and other Opposition Members.

The Budget contains measures for supporting families with children through child benefit rises and encouraging business by lower corporation tax and special concessions for small business. The Budget provides extra cash for education and health, £500 million for public transport, more support for the environment and—all-importantly—the setting of a long-term economic framework for the prosperity of Britain in a global marketplace.

The Leader of the Opposition said that the initiatives on corporation tax, small business tax, the challenge funds for universities in terms of venture capital, the reduction in national insurance and the reform of capital gains tax were all the idea of the shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer—that they were all your ideas.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Davies: I apologise if—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must sit down when I am on my feet. I am trying to help him to remember the convention of the House that hon. Members refer to one another in the third person. Remarks must be addressed only through the Chair.

Mr. Davies: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker—I was not suggesting that you had claimed those tax policies as your idea. The suggestion was that they were the idea of the Conservative party. If they were—and of course they were not—why were they not implemented in the 18 years of Conservative Government? Why, instead, did we have years of drift that ended in £400 billion of public sector debt?

I come to that well-trodden, pedestrian point that the Prime Minister claimed that there would be no new taxes under Labour. Frankly, no voter believes that a new Government will not reshape the fiscal terrain to deliver their ambitions on poverty, on environmental sustainability, on employment, on security and on building a coherent society and future prosperity. Everybody knew that our pledge was that the lower and higher rates of income tax would not be increased—and they will not be. Indeed, I am confident that the overall tax burden will be less by the time of the next general election.

Mr. Woodward: The hon. Gentleman says that the overall tax burden will have come down by the time of the next election. Will he explain the Government figures which suggest that, this year, the burden in terms of net taxes and social security contributions is 37.2 per cent., whereas the projection for 2001-2 is 38.5 per cent.? By using simple mathematics, can he explain by what magical trick the proportion will be reduced in the final week before a general election?

Mr. Davies: There is not going to be an election next year. The key point is that the centrepiece of the Budget is making work pay. Our strategy is to translate claimants into taxpayers—we shall create opportunity where there was despair. By creating an economy based on work, we shall establish a virtuous cycle.

The Conservative Government characteristically built an economy of spiralling taxation and low success. Their mismanagement meant that there were hidden taxes—for example, the BSE crisis cost £3.7 billion, and the underpricing of shares in the privatisation programme cost £5.7 billion. Moreover, it took the Labour Government to give the Bank of England independence, which is saving £6 billion a year in terms of the repayment of Government debt, as long-term borrowing costs are the lowest for 30 years.

Another myth is that the Conservatives are the friends of rural areas—we have just heard that claptrap from the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton–Brown). Tory Members scoff at the £50 million for rural infrastructure, but that is not an insignificant amount. Part of the Tory legacy is the scrapping of rural transport as a result of deregulation, which was a complete disgrace. I am glad that our partners in the business community are responding to the challenge of the new Labour Administration. For example, BP today issued a press release saying that it would reduce relative prices of petrol in rural communities, which is a very welcome step.

Mr. Loughton: We have heard that red herring several times this evening, but will the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that the reduction in the oil price may have something to do with the fact that, over the past six months, the price of a barrel of oil has fallen from $20 to less than $13?

Mr. Davies: No. I am talking about the urban-rural differential, not the average price. The increases in fuel taxes are broadly in line with those imposed by the previous Administration, yet the Conservative party has now performed a cynical U-turn in an attempt to get more votes.

The Labour Government are introducing an environmental package. There is a policy shift from taxing the vehicle to taxing use. That is a sensible step, not only for people who work in car factories, but for the environment. Moreover, we are spending £500 million extra on public transport—we hope to continue that policy in future Budgets.

Mr. Clifton–Brown: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that a shift in taxation from the vehicle to its use is exactly what discriminates against rural dwellers, whom I want to protect?

Mr. Davies: That is why we are spending £50 million on rural transport, which the Conservative party destroyed.

On families, child benefit will rise by 20 per cent., which is the biggest ever increase. What is remarkable is that, after the idea of progressive taxation on child benefit had been floated, the Leader of the Opposition called it a betrayal. I cannot believe that the Conservative party, which used to talk about targeting, has changed its policy so cynically—it is outrageous and pathetic.

The Leader of the Opposition then claimed that we were on the brink of recession—that jobs were at risk because of an overvalued pound and high interest rates. However, the figures for February, which have only just been released, show that an extra 13,700 people are in jobs, and that unemployment is at 4.9 per cent., which is the lowest level for 18 years—since June 1980, in fact, very shortly after Labour were in office.

Mr. Woodward: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: I shall take the hon. Gentleman's very predictable intervention.

Mr. Woodward: Can the hon. Gentleman say what the sterling-deutschmark exchange rate is this evening as a result of yesterday's Budget? Does he agree that the pound is overvalued?

Mr. Davies: At a guess, I think it is about DM3.2 to the pound. [HON. MEMBERS: "Wrong."] Anyway, it is in that area. I understand the rather simplistic point that the hon. Gentleman is trying to make. He is saying that sterling is too high—

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment, as he is wearing a very nice tie.

The Leader of the Opposition said that Britain was on the brink of recession because of the exchange rate, but if the export market is in such a bad way, why do the 1997 figures show that Britain has a trade surplus for the first time since 1985? Moreover, that surplus is the largest since 1982—£4.5 billion for 1997, as opposed to £1.8 billion in 1996. That is hardly an export-driven recession.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: In a second. Please sit down. There is a big queue and I will take you one at a time, if you can contain yourselves in your seats—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that I may have to help the hon. Gentleman again. While I am on my feet, I appeal for rather less exuberance on the Opposition Benches.

Mr. Davies: In difficult trading conditions, with sterling high, goods have been holding their own and services have been expanding, owing to the quality and productivity improvements in the British economy.

The shadow Chancellor should realise that the exchange rate cannot be explained entirely in terms of relative interest rates. The pound is strong because there is international confidence in the British economy and, not least, in the British Chancellor and his Budget. That is unfortunate in some senses. Everyone realises what a good job we are doing.

There is also great uncertainty over the euro. Will there be a strong independent bank? Will there be political fudges? Did the fact that it was announced on the very day of the Budget that the drachma would be part of the euro have any impact? Of course it did, because some people feel that it might drag down the average value of the euro, increasing uncertainty and making sterling a refuge currency. We understand that.

[Mr. Davies]

There is uncertainty in Asia and a recession in Japan, and Europe—I am thinking of Germany in particular—has been depressed by having to fulfil the Maastricht criteria quickly. All that has contributed to the strength of the pound, alongside the fact that we are at the top of our economic cycle. The United States is in a similar situation to ours, and our exchange rate with the dollar has been steady for about 15 months.

The pound is holding up, as a function of the good job that we are doing; markets are up; pension values are up; and things are looking good.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Davies: I shall give way to the chap with the pink tie.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are not chaps. We are hon. Members in the House.

Mr. Paterson: I am touched by the gallant comments about my tie, but I am shocked that the hon. Gentleman should dismiss as simplistic a question about the exchange rate. Does not he realise that 20 per cent. of the British economy is based on manufacturing and that tens of thousands of people are worried stiff about the exchange rate, which, for his information, has gone to DM3.05?

Mr. Davies: I realise that there is concern, but it is worth looking at the trade figures and at how well we are doing under difficult conditions. The uncertainties that I described are temporary—they may take a year or so to get out of the system—but we are creating conditions, with long-term policies, in which we are doing well despite the strength of the pound. Employment and prosperity prospects will continue to improve.

Mr. Ruffley: What reasons can the hon. Gentleman give the House for the downgrading of the gross domestic product forecast for 1998, from 2 per cent. to 2.5 per cent.?

Mr. Davies: As I said—[HON. MEMBERS: "Resign."] Unfortunately, I have no job. There has been a modest reduction in growth prospects, and I do not deny that that is partly linked to the prevailing exchange rate, but that does not contradict anything that I have said.

The introduction of working families tax credit is greatly to be commended. As with almost every other measure, we still do not know whether the Opposition support it. The 10p tax rate has not yet been introduced, and Opposition Members may scoff, but we inherited a legacy of a £400 billion deficit, and at the right time we will introduce the lower rate.

The Leader of the Opposition and the shadow Chancellor suggested that everybody loses, but among those who gain are families; the unemployed; the low-paid; small, medium and large businesses; the environment; people in education; and people in health. Almost everybody gains. It is a brilliant Budget: a Budget for jobs and work. After 18 years of drift, uncertainty and U-turns, we have a framework for success. I am proud to be here to support it.

Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): It is always entertaining to follow the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies), so I shall not take offence at the fact that he failed to comment on my tie, of which I am rather proud. I apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for any over-exuberance among Opposition Members, but we have certainly had far better entertainment than anything that is on television this evening.

This is a Budget of prudence and stability. We know that because the Chancellor found it necessary to repeat it 17 times yesterday. It was mirrored in the green Budget and last year's ISA consultation paper, in which the Paymaster General constantly referred to the "prudent and sensible" savers from under whose feet he was so keen until yesterday to pull the rug. As William Blake said:

"Prudence is a rich, ugly, old maid courted by Incapacity."

The trouble is that we are never treated to any clue as to what prudence and stability in the Chancellor's economic dictionary actually amount to. What is a stable and prudent level for the ratio of public debt to national income, for example? What is a stable and prudent level for the public sector borrowing requirement at a time when yesterday's edition of The Sun—on the reverse of a rather fetching picture of Melinda Messenger—was briefed to say:

"The Iron Chancellor, Gordon Brown, will use today's Budget to raise a fortune in taxes to start paying off the £420 billion national debt"?

Of course, that did not happen. The complete failure of that to happen as The Sun had been briefed did not deter it from printing a picture of a dwarf Chancellor today under the headline,

"Hi-ho, Hi-ho, it's off to work we go".

Mr. Ruffley: Gordon Messenger.

Mr. Loughton: It could be Gordon Messenger. I do not know whether it is Dopey or Grumpy; it certainly is not Bashful. The article refers to

"a revolutionary Budget designed to get every jobless person in Britain back to work."

Perhaps it has something to do with the lapdog nature of certain elements of the press that they should be completely misled on one day and be perfectly happy to go along with what they are told the day after.

In not reducing the national debt, the Chancellor missed a golden opportunity to go into public sector surplus. Instead of any explanation, we were treated to additional alliterative variations on prudence, with the glorious phrase:

"prudence for a purpose: to meet the people's priorities."—[Official Report, 17 March 1998; Vol. 308, c. 1112.]

Despite the hype, the soundbite frenzy and the alliteration, the Budget will more accurately go down as the transvestite Budget, for it is not what it seems: it has undergone an unprecedented tarting up by the spin doctors.

Yesterday, we heard an implicit threat to tax child benefit. Child benefit has had a bit of a makeover: a little blusher here, a lot of lip gloss there, and it is known as modernisation of the welfare state, dependent on that old favourite, the children's review, which we were promised yesterday, to add to the 150-odd reviews that are already in the pipeline.

The Budget was hailed originally as a triumph for businesses, but by the end of the day, when the foundation and mascara had started to crack and run, many burdens on business were revealed, not least the working families tax credit, the assessment and verification of which will be down to the companies themselves.

A major reason why that Conservative idea was dropped in 1985 concerned the additional burdens on small businesses, in particular. In addition, there are bad employers who will deliberately hold down wages now that they have a greater knowledge of their employees' entitlements.

Yesterday, we also had a variation on the nanny state—it has become the subsidised nanny state, quite literally, and the proposals for generous child care put far greater reliance on anyone other than the parents looking after children.

We also saw some tokenism on museum charges. I greatly welcome free admission to museums, but what were we treated to? Just £2 million, which is a drop in the ocean and, in any case, does not apply to all national museums. The National Art Collections Fund said that it is more like a stop gap than a long-term solution. It is a betrayal of another Labour election manifesto pledge, when only last week it was hyped that we would need at least £40 million to guarantee free admission to our national museums.

Of course, we had the prospect of the 10p starting rate of tax dangled alluringly in front of us yet again, but not today. Again, it is jam tomorrow, or in this case, jam tart.

I could go on, but I want to mention three main features of the Budget that are seriously flawed. The first is tax and in particular the changes to capital gains tax. The second is ISAs and the third is another example of the soundbite and presentation triumphing over reality and substance, in the form of the supposed environmental measures.

Mr. Geraint Davies: I know that hon. Members bring to this Chamber personal experiences, which they weave into their words. I wonder where the references to transvestites and tarts and so forth come from in the hon. Gentleman's past.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is an unworthy comment, which the hon. Member would do better to withdraw.

Mr. Davies: In that case, I shall withdraw it.

Mr. Loughton: I should like to declare a rather relevant interest, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as I have worked in a merchant bank for the past 14 years, dealing in particular with personal equity plans and managing private clients' funds.

On CGT and tax, it was a watchword of successive Conservative Chancellors on tax to "keep it low, keep it simple". Indeed, when the noble Lord Lawson was Chancellor, he made a virtue out of abolishing a tax in every year that he delivered a Budget. The proposed changes to CGT represent a minefield of confusion and complication, which can be welcomed only by the accountancy profession and those engaged in producing new computer software for the finance industry.

By my calculations, before yesterday's Budget, we already faced the prospect of five different income tax rates: 20, 23 and 40 per cent. for most incomes, and 10 and 32.5 per cent. for dividends. If that were not complex enough, under yesterday's proposals for CGT tapering, there will be no fewer than 18 new different rates of CGT for private individuals, on non-business assets alone. That makes 23 different rates of tax for dividends and CGT alone—hardly, "keep it simple."

The indexation system may not have been perfect, but it was certainly straightforward and workable. Now it is to be replaced by a far more complicated system. As my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) said, it is a swiz. The freezing of indexation for the next 10 years will amount to much more than the reduction of 16 per cent. in CGT rates for higher rate taxpayers and 9.2 per cent. for basic rate taxpayers, for those who are prepared to lock away their equities in a cupboard for the next 10 years and leave them untouched.

The changes are a nightmare for fund managers, who already face the prospect of spending millions on new computer systems to deal with ISAs and will now have to adapt their computer systems for a far more complicated taxation system than I have ever experienced. They will have three weeks in which to do it before the proposal starts on 6 April. I know of no other country that has such a complicated system. I cannot believe that it will survive the full rigours of the Finance Bill Standing Committee—I certainly hope that it will not. It represents a major flaw in the Budget, and other implications stem from it.

Taxation considerations will now wag the tail of the dog of investment prudence. People will hang on to shares for all the wrong reasons. What is the problem with holding shares in one blue-chip pharmaceutical company, for example, or even a food producer—the hon. Member for Croydon, Central had great and detailed knowledge of that industry before he left its employ some while ago—for the space of two years? If the value has gone up a lot, one takes a profit and reinvests it and the capital in another United Kingdom blue-chip company, such as engineering. That is what managed fund managers do all the time, but under these proposals, people will be clobbered for the full extent of CGT, at the 40 per cent. rate.

I am also greatly concerned about the confusion that will be caused and the extra expense that will fall on shareholders, let alone the fund managers running their funds, with the ending of pooling. One would have to work out the exact date on which each stock, scrip dividend or whatever it might be was acquired and which level of the tapering CGT rate applied to it. That will be a field day for accountants.

Also, the proposal gives no incentive for badly performing companies to perform better if they know that shareholders are locked in, fearful of taking a higher capital gains tax rate. If there is no threat of selling, why need a managing director get his act together?

I am also concerned about the ending of bed and breakfasts. Bed and breakfasting has been legitimate for the ordinary investors of middle Britain, so that they can take advantage of an annual CGT allowance without having to dispose of decent blue-chip investments. The impact on smaller shareholders with pooled funds would be that, if they were investing in a good, performing blue-chip unit trust and they wanted to take advantage of their annual CGT allowance, they would not be able to bed-and-breakfast it and buy it back the following day, but would have to sell it and look for an alternative investment, regardless of how well the fund was performing and how much they would like to stay with that fund manager. Otherwise, they would risk facing a much bigger CGT bill when they sold a larger holding at a later date. All that was done yesterday with no warning, and the sum total of the proposals will be severely to limit people's ability to manage their assets.

On ISAs we saw the biggest U-turn of all. I cannot recall a time when so big a U-turn has been conceded by so few in the face of such a tremendously bad reception by so many discontented investors. Let us be charitable. We welcome the Damascene conversion in the wake of a concerted and professional campaign by the finance industry and Conservative Members. However, it is more than a touch ironic that the Government have caved in to the campaign by the City, or that self-regulatory trade body in the City to which the Chief Secretary referred just two weeks ago in regard to putting an end to the nonsense of self-regulation, which was too often more a matter of self-interest than of public interest.

Certainly the self-regulatory organisations have won the day over the Chief Secretary and the Paymaster General in this case. I hope that that sets a good precedent for listening to the professionals and climbing down accordingly in the future, on other highly flawed measures contained in the Budget. It will be good to see a repentant Paymaster General when he reveals himself from behind the Speaker's Chair later in the Budget proceedings.

What a climbdown it has been. Alongside ISAs, PEPs and TESSA holdings will keep their tax-free status, and in the light of their success, people will be able to add an extra £9,000 full contribution to them in the next tax year. There will be no lifetime limit, and the £6,000 general PEP contribution that we have been able to make in the past 11 years will simply be replaced by a £5,000 contribution into ISAs over the next 10 years, and one's capital will be fully accessible. ISAs will be free of CGT and income tax.

What I have just described is little different from the PEP regime, which still prevails under a different acronym and has done so well for the past 11 years. In other words, we could have avoided all this upheaval and all the costs of the consultation process—I shall be interested to learn how much the Government have had to spend on the farrago that it has turned out to be. We could have avoided all the uncertainty caused to investors, who, as my hon. Friends have said, have been a major factor in the drastic slippage in the savings ratio from 11 per cent. to the 9 per cent. forecast in the Red Book.

We could also have avoided all the hassle among PEP providers, who are faced with little time and a big bill to install new systems, and at the same time face competition in Germany, Luxembourg and Dublin, which has been hotting up and taking advantage of the vacuum in the savings market in this country. We could have avoided all that by amending and simplifying the current, successful PEP system. I would have liked modifications on merging single-company PEPs with general PEPs, and improving their attractions and accessibility to cash. It could have been done by a little adjustment without the cost, upheaval and hassle that we have had.

Not content with substituting acronyms—the term ISA was always a sign of hope for divine intervention, because it is the Muslim word for the prophet Jesus—the Paymaster General made the new system much more complicated. There are many unanswered details for the Standing Committee to consider. How will the separate elements that will comprise the ISA be regulated? How can people get the best advice in the hurly-burly of the Tesco queue while paying for their frozen peas and totting up their discount vouchers on this week's star yoghurt bargain buys?

Will uninvested equity cash in ISAs be liable for interest or will it not attract any, as promised in the consultation document? If the latter, does the interest go to the stockbroker, who obviously needs it? What best advice will be available for fledgling investors, to deter them from staking all on, for example, a Thailand single-country fund or an Australian uranium mine? That can happen now, and it may happen in future unless best advice is available at an affordable cost, particularly to new savers.

There is also the problem of benchmarking and kitemarking, which were flagged up by the Chief Secretary and have apparently been outlawed by the European Union because they represent pre-authorising financial products.

The Budget has left little time for providers to get new computer systems for ISAs up and running by April 1999. Most of the Investment Management Regulatory Organisation cases, and the fines that resulted from them, came about because of bad, inadequate administration. The proposals will be a bonanza for computer software manufacturers. I welcome that; it is a recommendation to buy shares in companies involved in that part of the market.

Only two weeks ago, the Government were arguing that the major problem with PEPs and TESSAs was the tax relief lost to the Treasury, which amounted to some £1.5 billion. As the Chief Secretary said, there is no point in continuing to give tax relief to people who can already afford to have significant sums locked up for long periods.

In several long-winded contributions, Labour Members have railed against the fat cats who had as much as £50,000 invested in their PEPs. What has changed in the past two weeks? The proposals now allow PEPs and TESSAs to continue and allow holders to take out ISAs as well. As well as attracting new ISA investors, that will result in a rather greater loss of tax relief to the Treasury. What is new? What has happened in the past two weeks? I do not understand it, but I welcome it. I am glad that the Government now admit that, if they are to achieve the necessary objective of deepening everyone's savings pot, they must forgo tax relief on savings, because that is the major incentive to save.

Even the new proposals are a major missed opportunity. There is still no real incentive to attract this elusive band of new savers. The Prime Minister said on 3 December:

"There will be 6 million extra savers as a result—6 million people who will be able to save but at present cannot."—[Official Report, 3 December 1997; Vol. 302, c. 349.]

That was not refuted in yesterday's Budget speech. I trust that it still holds good, but why? Who are the heaving horde of 6 million awaiting the Paymaster General's signal to throw their money at new Labour's new savings plan? Where are they? Are they too shy to show themselves? Perhaps they are the people who will inhabit the spurious 4.4 million new dwellings that are supposed to be needed.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend makes a serious point. Does he agree that there are considerable dangers in the supermarket selling of ISAs? Customers will be encouraged to invest in ISAs by someone without any financial experience. They could be an unsuitable form of investment for them.

Mr. Loughton: My hon. Friend makes an apposite point. Even if the mechanism is more sophisticated than the potential investor struggling through the checkout queue, good advice may be available at the point of entry, but what guarantees that good advice will prevail thereafter? Who will give best advice, especially to new investors, when it is time to switch out of that supermarket's financial product into that of a rival? There is no guarantee of continuity of best advice. As people in the financial industry know, best advice costs. The proposals take no account of such costs.

I am keen to identify the elusive horde of 6 million. Are they the 6 million crowd that will queue up to explore the internal organs of the millennium dome's androgynous figure? It is a mystery greater than Loch Ness or anything on "The X Files".

For the less well-off, there is no attraction in replacing a capital gains tax allowance of £6,800 with an ISA with no CGT implications. Most such people get nowhere near capital gains like that. The income on a £5,000 portfolio of equities at a yield of 3.2 per cent.—an average market yield currently—would be £128 in net dividends plus a £14 tax credit for the next five years only. That is highly likely to be wiped out by charges alone. Instead, it is likely that most new savers will use ISAs as tax-free bank accounts, to transfer existing cash from non-tax-free bank accounts. They will use them as a short-term savings plan to save for Christmas or summer holidays, and thereby not add a penny of new money to savings—and especially not to long-term savings.

The absence of a bonus credit system or a link to the benefit system means that there are no incentives in the ISA proposals for new savers. It is a lost opportunity. The Paymaster General has failed, although he has considerably redeemed himself by not putting the PEPs and TESSAs system to the torch, as he had proposed. The whole exercise has been a shambles, a lesson in how not to rush into things dogmatically; if it ain't bust, don't fix it. The industry has been left with a more complicated system, and the consumer is left confused and disoriented without even the compensation of the thrill of the promised monthly prize draw, which has now, alas, been dropped.

I am a member of the Environmental Audit Select Committee. When it was set up, it was described by the Deputy Prime Minister as a terrier to snap at the heels of Government, but only last week it turned into a savage rottweiler, with the report that it issued. I am glad that the Financial Secretary is here, because she was dragged kicking and screaming to give evidence to us and has had to reverse her opinion of us. The Budget's environmental content, contrary to some of the spurious claims made in verbose terms by Labour Members earlier, is purely tinkering, and has already been given the thumbs down by the environmental groups. Their summary was that Brown is going green only at the edges.

The Budget is not what it seems. Of the £500 million extra of public transport money, at least £290 million will be gobbled up to patch up the London underground. The VAT reduction on energy-saving materials applies only to people claiming grants under existing Government efficiency schemes. Again, I am glad that the Financial Secretary is here because, ironically, she led the vote to try to get VAT exemption for all energy-efficiency products. Of course, the Government have not done it; it is not even a halfway house, but is a token measure.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Dawn Primarolo): I shall return to the subject of energy-saving materials and the campaign against the Conservative Government later, but, as Conservative Members have commented on the fuel escalator, will the hon. Gentleman tell the House whether he supports the recommendation of the Environmental Audit Select Committee that the escalator should be set higher than the Government have set it?

Mr. Loughton: The Select Committee's report was a joint effort, when many of us made representations, but the report as a whole has been endorsed by all of us on the Committee. However, I am happy to speak on the subject of fuel. As the Royal Automobile Club has pointed out, the Budget has brought in £2.75 billion extra from motorists, which is 14 times the enhanced sum that is to be given to public transport. Motorists pay £30 billion a year in taxes, yet less than a third of that comes back to transport. The Budget was described by one environmental group as not much better than a smog alert.

Nothing in the Budget backs up in any way the speeches made by the Deputy Prime Minister, about the need to move to greater use of brown-field sites for housing development. Rhetoric is one thing, but nothing will happen unless it is backed up by tax incentives for developers to take advantage of that form of land for future house-building requirements. Nothing in yesterday's Budget advanced that policy at all. All that is a long way from the Select Committee's recommendation that environmental taxes should be recycled into incentivising environmental improvements. It is a con: the Government are unashamedly using the environmental concern tag to justify increasing taxes on general consumption.

The real test of the Budget will be the impact on the pound and on interest rates. The hon. Member for Croydon, Central failed to understand that the Budget has caused the continuation of the relentless rise in the value of sterling. It now stands at more than DM3.05, which is a nine-year high; and it is up against the euro and the dollar. The value of sterling is crucifying manufacturing exports: in the three months to November, exports to non-EU countries fell by 1.6 per cent. and imports rose by 3.8 per cent. If that trend continues, it will be absolutely disastrous for this country's manufacturing industry.

The Chancellor displays an attitude of, "Not me, guv—it's not my fault; it's all down to the Bank of England. It is responsible for the sterling rate and for interest rates—they are nothing to do with me." It is a disgraceful indictment of the Government that the Chancellor is prepared to stand by and do nothing as industry is squeezed by the pound. The Budget also makes interest rate rises far more likely, as several Labour Members mentioned. The gilt market fell heavily after hours last night and fell again this morning. Consumer spending is likely to rise by more than 4 per cent., as the Government's figures showed yesterday.

I started by saying that the Budget should go down as the transvestite Budget. I trust that, by the end of the Committee stage on the Finance Bill, the Chancellor will have allowed us to amend it, so that it is a more palatable bedfellow for those on both sides of the House and for all parts of the United Kingdom.

8.2 pm

Mr. David Prior (North Norfolk): No Chancellor since the war could have come to the Dispatch Box with a better economic background, consisting of the most successful economy in Europe, low inflation, falling unemployment and strong public finances. Judged by the Maastricht criteria, we probably have the only economy in Europe that could have passed without smoke and mirrors. As the Chancellor—perhaps we should now call him "the guardian of the people's money"—said, this is a "once in a generation" opportunity for radical change, and it is against that background that the Budget must be judged.

There are parts of the Budget that I welcome, but the macro-judgment will ultimately overwhelm the micro-parts. If the Chancellor has read the economy wrongly, the resulting recession will overwhelm his policies on trying to get people back to work. I fear that he has it wrong. He seems utterly unaware that manufacturing industry, which employs about 4 million people directly and 8 million indirectly, and which is responsible for two thirds of total exports, has been suffering for several months.

As Graham Mackenzie, the director general of the Engineering Employers Federation, said:

"The key issue for engineering and manufacturing remains the exchange rate."

There is a growing weight of evidence that UK manufacturing companies are now reviewing their investment plans. Jack Smith, the chairman of General Motors said only a week ago:

"sterling's strength has turned the UK into a high-cost economy for inward investments".

The same has recently been stated by Honda.

Many companies that have struggled to export over the past year and have taken lower margins on their exports so as to retain markets are now concluding that at DM3-plus to the pound, they will have to review their activities. We shall soon see companies such as British Steel making a final decision on capacity in the UK. British Steel's view is:

"The undue emphasis currently placed on UK interest rates to combat inflation is resulting in the UK manufacturing sector—and within it the UK steel industry—bearing the brunt of the anti-inflation medicine . . . yet the manufacturing sector is itself exhibiting few signs of inflationary pressures."

The problem of the high pound has been aggravated by two policy mistakes by the Government. The first is that interest rates, which have gone up five times since Labour came into office, are too high and the inflation target of 2.5 per cent. is too rigid, failing to take into account the fact that inflation is running at about 0.5 per cent. in the manufacturing sector, as compared with 4.5 per cent. in the service sector. The great risk that, in the process of trying to stamp out that 4.5 per cent., a large part of British industry will be condemned to death. That is exactly what happened in the early part of the 1980s, as Labour Members may remember.

Interest rates alone are not a satisfactory way of addressing the problem, and the Chancellor, by failing even to mention that during his Budget statement, has missed an opportunity to tackle it. It is widely accepted that Britain currently has a two-speed economy; why are the Government persisting with a policy that is unnecessarily damaging British manufacturing industry?

The second policy mistake was to tax pensions and savings heavily and put pressure on companies' cash flow through the abolition of ACT. The tax on pensions will cost about £5 billion per annum. Corporate cash flows will be hit to the tune of £20 billion over the lifetime of this Parliament despite the welcome reduction in corporation tax and some alleviation for small and medium companies.

My fear is that we are about to enter an unnecessary recession with rising unemployment, rising imports and falling exports and that, for all the Chancellor's exhortations about ending the stop-go cycle, he is contributing to it. We need a better balance between fiscal and monetary policy to allow a progressive reduction of UK interest rates, which would lead to a more competitive and realistic exchange rate. If we do not do that, export order intake will continue to weaken as it has for more than a year now. Imports will rise and unemployment will stop falling. All that will be compounded by the problems in south-east Asia and stagnant growth in Japan.

I shall now deal with some of the micro-aspects to the Budget. I have already said that I am concerned that unemployment will start to rise at the end of this year. Despite that, I welcome the Chancellor's attempts to remove the poverty trap and to make employment more attractive, but how does that square with the minimum wage and the adoption of the social chapter—two measures which will, over time, push up the cost of employment to employers and counteract the policies to remove the poverty trap?

I am also concerned that those measures—especially the increase in national insurance contributions over £81 a week—will work against skilled higher-paid people. Against a background of tuition fees and loans for student maintenance, it is vital that the labour market provides real incentives for the individual to learn skills through higher education.

I am disappointed that there is no change to business rates. Of all the taxes raised from small businesses, business rates are the most damaging, because they are a fixed charge unrelated to profitability. A reduction in business rates for small companies is long overdue, and I am sad that the Chancellor has not taken the opportunity to alter the rates in this Budget.

I am particularly concerned about rural transport as I represent a rural constituency. Many poor people in the country have no access to public transport and no reasonable prospect of securing such access. They already find it extremely difficult to run a motor car. The increase in the tax on petrol of 4.4p per litre is a real blow to many of my constituents, who will not view the £50 million rural transport fund, spread over three years, as any solution to their problems. That fund is a triumph of presentation over substance—and it also says something about the Government's obsession with presentation.

The Budget does not mention the most unkind tax hike of all—the increase in council tax bills, especially in rural areas. Council tax has increased by an average of about 8.5 per cent. this year. In many rural areas, including my constituency, it has risen by more than 14 per cent. at a time when services—especially social services and education services—are being cut. The increase in the landfill tax from £7 to £10 per tonne will have another knock-on effect for local government.

What should I say to the pensioner in my constituency who wrote to me last week? He will now pay an extra 4.4p per litre for his petrol, higher council tax and more for a pint of beer. In April, he received an extra £1.96 on his basic pension. He told me not to take any political hogwash from this Government—although he supported them at the last election. After this Budget, it will be difficult to give an answer.

I support some aspects of the Budget. For example, I support the reduction in corporation tax rates and the Government's genuine efforts to reduce the poverty trap and to get people back to work. I am pleased that the Government have ended the retrospective tax on PEPs and TESSAs. However, judged against the economic background and the opportunities that the Government had in this Budget, it is disappointing and uninspiring.

The Budget does not begin to recognise what is happening in the real manufacturing economy of this country. It does not do enough for small businesses and it continues to discriminate against rural areas. Perhaps above all, the Government have missed an opportunity to take a real, radical look at the tax and benefit system.

8.12 pm

Mr. Shaun Woodward (Witney): Rarely has the House been subjected to a Budget that has been so highly trailed, so widely leaked and based on so much rhetoric and so little substance. As my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition said yesterday, the Budget makes many claims but is ultimately a step-by-step betrayal both of the Labour party's election promises and of the British people.

The Government have produced a Budget that I believe will be viewed as an abdication of responsibility. It will go down as a Budget delivered by a Chancellor who ducked the real challenges of the British economy and confused opportunity with opportunism. It will go down as a Budget of which the magician Paul Daniels would have been proud.

Yesterday the Chancellor made much of the fact that this is a once-in-a-generation Budget. Yet, if we examine the Chancellor's claims, something appears to be missing—perhaps the Budget's centrepiece has been left out. One can only conclude that the right hon. Gentleman and the Prime Minister had conversations at Chequers last weekend that led to some distortions of the Budget statement.

The Chancellor told us yesterday that the Budget would end the unemployment and poverty traps—indeed, much has been made of the working families tax credit. However, it is difficult to see how, at a cost of just a few billion, it will be possible to wipe out poverty. That is a laudable aim with which all hon. Members agree, but it is difficult to see how it will be achieved with that sort of money. How will it be funded? Funding this year will be provided largely by the road fuel escalator. We must consider that many of those at whom the working families tax credit will be directed will also be hit hardest by the increase in fuel duty.

I know that that is the case in my constituency. I have received many letters today from constituents describing their real worries about how they will get around in rural areas. Those worries are not alleviated one jot by the promise of an extra £50 million spread over three years. I am afraid that that simply shows that the Labour Government do not understand the real needs of the countryside and the rural areas of our country.

This Budget has ducked the true challenges of our country. It has exercised opportunism at every turn. The Government could have taken many opportunities to help this country, but they did not do so—undoubtedly because the focus groups did not reveal to the Chancellor and the Prime Minister that the time was right.

I take the example of the proposed reforms to capital gains tax. The report entitled "Budget 98 Alert" produced by Ernst and Young and released this morning states:

"The taper does not encourage risk taking since it benefits success but offers no relief for losses. In fact, losses on investment become less valuable, as they reduce gains before tapering."

The devil is always in the detail, and I suspect that, as the details emerge, we shall identify many faults with this Budget—just as we did with the last Budget.

The Chancellor announced yesterday a cut in corporation tax—a move welcomed by all Conservative Members. Yet, as my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition revealed this afternoon, if one looks closely at the figures, one can see that, while the Chancellor gives with one hand, he uses the hands of every Minister on the Treasury Bench to grab back. Business will lose as a consequence.

This Budget does nothing to address the imbalances built up in the economy as a result of the appreciation of sterling—imbalances that have worsened significantly since July. It appears that the Chancellor thinks that he has washed his hands of short-term macro-economic policy since last June. Ernst and Young describes that as "benign neglect". The Opposition will hold the Chancellor to account for that benign neglect because it is an abrogation of his responsibility as Chancellor.

Yesterday the Chancellor had nothing substantial to offer manufacturing. The figures for the fourth quarter of 1997 show that manufacturing grew last year by 0.9 per cent.—less than 1 per cent. Next year, it is estimated that output growth will be between zero and 0.5 per cent. Last November—just four months ago—the Treasury issued the optimistic projection that manufacturing output would grow by 1.5 per cent. to 1.75 per cent. There has been a pretty dramatic revision in just four months, and that is a serious problem for manufacturing in Britain. What hope did the Chancellor hold out in his Budget to those in manufacturing?

[Mr. Shaun Woodward]

The Prime Minister this afternoon made much of how business welcomed the Budget. Perhaps it would be better if he stopped reading the newspapers and went out of his bunker in Downing street and his anaesthetised road shows, and met some of the people whose incomes he is clobbering so hard. What would he see, if he went out? The hundreds of thousands of people who do not have subsidised jobs but real jobs, and who are facing the prospect of real unemployment.

Those are the kind of people throughout the country who know that sterling is overvalued. Labour Members were unable to tell us this evening what sterling closed at against the deutschmark, such is their disregard for the consequences of their Budget. Those people face the prospect of a life on the dole. It is all very well for the Government to invent wonderful schemes such as the welfare-to-work scheme, but at the same time they must guarantee the jobs of the people who are in work at present. The Budget will not do that.

If the Chancellor and the Prime Minister had taken the time to read the releases from the Engineering Employers Federation, they would see that it gives a cautious welcome for the cuts in corporation tax, but the real issue for the EEF is the exchange rate. Export orders have been severely declining over recent months and matters are expected to get worse over the coming year.

Last night, as Ministers were offering soundbites all over the media, the Chief Secretary was pressed repeatedly by Jeremy Paxman on "Newsnight" to say whether he believed that sterling was overvalued. Could he give an answer? No. Five times he was pressed for a simple yes or no, and five times we were subjected to paragraphs of verbose effusion but no simple answer.

If the Chief Secretary spent a little more time out of the television studio and travelling round the country, he would see the damage that the Government's terrible policy is doing to our country.

We do not have to take hon. Members' word for it. Numerous firms today produced their reports of the consequences of the Budget, and it is very bad news for manufacturing. Goldman Sachs expects at least two quarter point rises in the coming weeks. Charterhouse expects the same. The Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation describes the Budget as a "considerable disappointment" in its approach to macro-economic policy. As KPMG say, unless the Budget is quickly followed by interest rate falls, the problems of manufacturing industry will remain and the prospects for economic activity this year and next may end up looking even more pessimistic than the Chancellor's own forecast.

That means that there is the prospect of recession. Manufacturing output is at record lows. Alongside that, we have the problems of managing a dual economy, with the service sector output up almost 4.5 per cent. last year.

Co-ordination of monetary and fiscal policy in the medium term is a matter for a Chancellor, yet yesterday we saw the Chancellor abdicate that responsibility because he believes that, since last June he no longer has responsibility. He gave it away. The problem is not for him now, but for those in manufacturing. The Chancellor had the opportunity, but he threw it away, leaving the prospect of a hard landing.

The Chancellor said that he wanted stability, but what sort of stability is there for those in manufacturing who face the prospect of a return to boom and bust—the stop-go policy that the Chancellor claimed yesterday he intended to eschew?

What sort of stability is it, when the Government revise their figures in just four months, from a growth of manufacturing at almost 2 per cent. to zero. Even on their own figures, a recession is in sight, but what did the Chancellor do?

We must look at other challenges, not least the challenge of controlling a consumer boom. It still exists in the high street, although the figures are marginally declining. The Chancellor again ducked the issue, because he wants to be the iron Chancellor, and he has his eye on the house next door. Consumer spending this year is forecast to grow between 3.75 per cent. and 4 per cent. That is higher than previous estimates, and the Budget has done nothing to restrain demand.

The combination of strong consumer demand and low industrial output is projected to lead to a deterioration in current account balance. After a surplus of £4.5 billion in 1997, the current account is now projected to fall to a deficit of £6.5 billion this year and £6.75 billion in 1999. The glossy book entitled "New Ambitions for Britain" will all too soon become for many people an ambition to survive in Britain. [Interruption.]

Hon. Members may laugh, but the laugh will be removed from their faces when they must answer the questions from those in manufacturing whose jobs they will have destroyed through the Budget. Betrayal is the hallmark of the Budget. Step by step the Government are betraying each of their promises. Step by step they betray the British people.

Labour Members make much of what the Government are doing with taxation. The hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies) was unable to understand from the Red Book that not only is the tax burden going up next year, 1998–99, but that it goes up in 1999–2000 and 2001. Unless I am wrong and the hon. Gentleman expects the quinquennial Act to be repealed, at the next election we will see that the figures have gone up and up. Under Labour, as sure as eggs is eggs, taxes go up. The tax burden of the United Kingdom will go up with this Government.

People were led to believe that there would be no new taxes under Labour and that the tax burden would fall, but the reality is quite different. Over the next few years, measures will be announced whereby the personal sector will be hit by tax increases of at least £4 billion in 1998-99, which is equivalent to 2p on the basic rate of tax. What kind of way is that to honour a pledge? The Government are putting taxes up and pretending to the public that they are doing nothing of the kind.

Despite the smoke and mirrors of the Budget, taxes are going up as a percentage of GDP. Even before the Chancellor stood up yesterday, taxes had gone up by £790 a year for the average family. It will not stop there. On 1 April, mortgage interest relief will be cut from 15 per cent. to 10 per cent.—another hit at middle Britain. Furthermore, there is the not too thinly veiled promise of child benefit being taxed in the future.

The British people should be warned that the Chancellor is after their money. He has only one ambition—to use his office to move to the house next door. [Interruption.] Hon. Members want me to sit down. They do not like hearing the truth. They do not like hearing that yesterday they tried to persuade the country that they were being generous on the health service. What did you do on the health service? You promised—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman may have to join the same class in procedure as the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies).

Mr. Woodward: I am grateful for the correction, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Hon. Members may like to know that the £500 million that they were promised yesterday for the health service will do little to get near the annual increase of 3 per cent. that the health service received under the Conservative Government. What will happen to hospitals such as Burford and Witney community hospitals in my constituency? They will be closed. Hon. Members may not like to know that, under their Government, that is what will happen. The reality is that the community health trust budget in Oxfordshire has been cut by £1.5 million. The county has been told to find the savings, and community hospitals will be closed. The proposal is an attempt to hoodwink the public, as is the Government's paltry promise of £50 million to deal with rural transport.

It is sad that so many people in this country will be disappointed by the Budget. Many in this country will see that this step-by-step betrayal of the people will result in unemployment, hospital closures, and closures of more village schools. The Government have misled the people. Sooner or later, the people will reject the Government.

8.30 pm

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me to speak in the debate on the Budget.

I speak as someone who, until 1 May, spent his whole career in manufacturing industry, travelling the world in a business that exports 95 per cent. of its production. I also speak for North Shropshire, which is a hard-working part of the country that depends on agriculture and small industry.

The Government do not bring credit on the House in their approach to the current economic situation. The people of this country are not stupid; they know perfectly well that it was Conservative policies that brought 23 consecutive quarters of growth, that created 1.4 million jobs and that halved the number of unemployed 18-to-24-year-old males—down to 40,000 in the last year. It is childish of the Government to make out that the great economic revolution has occurred since 1 May. Doing so does not bring credit on the House or the Government.

We are in our present position because hideously difficult decisions were taken from 1979 onwards by four Conservative Governments. Most of those decisions were taken in the teeth of the bitterest opposition from Labour Members—and from Liberal Democrats, represented at the moment by a solitary soul.

We heard a splendid speech this evening from the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson), which showed that the Novosibirsk tendency is still there. In my experience, a country prospers if it has fewer politicians, fewer bureaucrats, less Government interference and, ultimately, less taxation, but there are still some glorious old dinosaurs in the Labour party who would regard me as hell on wheels.

We have to recognise that the Government have made some of the right noises and that there are elements in the Budget that free-market capitalists such as me might welcome. One of the most interesting innovations is amalgamating the Contributions Agency with the Inland Revenue. As one who would like government reduced and costs reduced, I think that that may be an interesting, innovative measure. It will be desperately complicated for the Government to bring about, but if they do, well and good. If the Government want to be really radical, I suggest that they study the possibility of amalgamating national insurance contributions and income tax. As someone who has been in business, I know that the complication of filling in forms and serving Government takes an inordinate time.

I do not want to be churlish. There are elements in the Budget that show that the Government have learnt a little, but they still do not understand how a business and a capitalist economy work. Everything in the glorious Red Book may come to naught. Someone has gone to tremendous trouble to produce these figures, which, sadly, may all be absolute rubbish because of two desperate blunders made by the Government soon after they came to office. Handing over independence of the Bank of England to a small group of advisers has deprived the Chancellor of one of the vital tools in controlling the speed of the economy. Every week the Prime Minister gets in the phrase "boom and bust". It is a good phrase and it goes down well with the focus groups, but he has taken away one of the most crucial brakes on the economy—the ability to handle interest rates.

We also had the quite unnecessary Budget after the Government came to power which, according to the Confederation of British Industry, lobbed £22 billion-worth of extra taxation on the country, including the iniquitous £5 billion on pension funds. When consumer spending is running ahead, it was ludicrous to load the extra taxation on the productive sector—the savings sector—and not to try to reduce consumer activity. Those two blunders have come to a most dreadful head in the exchange rate.

It has been interesting to listen to Labour Members, particularly the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies), who quite obviously do not understand the impact that the exchange rate is having. It is extraordinary that they did not know that the pound has today gone to DM3.05, the highest figure for nine years. To turn up to a Budget debate and dismiss as childish the intervention made by my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Woodward) is bizarre. Manufacturing industry is on the brink of a serious recession. I hope that the Minister is listening carefully.

We heard eloquent speeches from my hon. Friends the Members for North Norfolk (Mr. Prior) and for Witney, with figures from the Engineering Employers Confederation. In my industry, plants are closing and jobs are being lost. The potteries in neighbouring constituencies are suffering badly. Orders are down as much as 40 per cent.

There is an extraordinarily naive passage in the Red Book that says, in effect, that the Government are not quite sure why orders have been holding up. That is not surprising from a Government who have never been in business. There is a run-over. These are long-run contracts, but that period is coming to an end and the Government must understand the impact that the exchange rate is having on manufacturing industry.

Agriculture has hardly been mentioned. I represent a rural seat and am on the Welsh Affairs Committee. Every time I go to the market, farmers tell me that they are desperately worried about the exchange rate. That was when the pound was under DM3. There are now 3.05 deutschmarks to the pound. In agriculture, it is simply not possible to switch production when producing one product. There is no flexibility of production. Farmers are tied into a world market and are going bust.

There are knock-on costs and a multiplier effect. What about feed merchants? What about agricultural implement suppliers? I know some who have not sold a tractor or plough for six months. They are in desperate trouble, yet the hon. Member for Croydon, Central turns up to the Budget debate and does not understand the impact of exchange rates. It is disgraceful. That was the main topic of conversation in Oswestry market today. I rang the local National Farmers Union representative and I have talked to farmers. They are frantic because they believe that the Budget does nothing to lower the exchange rate.

On television last night, the Chief Secretary refused five times to say whether the pound is at the right level. That is pathetic and totally unacceptable. His boss, the Chancellor, when prodded by Mr. Humphrys on the "Today" programme, also refused to give an opinion on the exchange rate. The Red Book is worthless if the man in charge does not have control of or some influence over the exchange rate.

The Red Book presumes that manufacturing will continue to grow at a stable rate, but it casts a horrible shadow. Growth is forecast to go down from between 2 and 2.5 per cent. to between 1.75 and 2.25 per cent. next year. There is a huge question mark over the stability of manufacturing. I have no doubt that manufacturing will go into recession. According to the Red Book, inflation is still stubbornly high at 2.75 per cent. That will have a further impact and it will bite into the figures.

The minimum wage and the social chapter, both of which are inflationary, will have a huge impact on businesses. If employers are forced by the Government to pay people more to produce the same amount of product, that is inflation on wheels. If they are forced to make employees redundant, the state will have to pick up the tab, and that is inflationary.

The Red Book does not mention the sharply inflationary impact of the minimum wage and its impact on differentials and social spending. The horrific indication is that the Government, who planned to cut social spending, will increase it. That is clear in the Red Book, but we know full well that Labour Members, from the Prime Minister down, have not bothered to read it properly.

Other elements will also drive up social spending. The Budget introduced the flagship innovation of the working families tax credit. Similar schemes have been tried in Australia and Canada, have proved extremely expensive and have not worked. When the Conservative Government considering such a measure, the Minister for Welfare Reform and the Chancellor dismissed it out of hand. If the Minister were here tonight, it would be interesting to hear why they have now changed their mind.

I want less Government involvement in business. The working families tax credit will put a huge burden on the personnel and finance management of relatively small businesses. I rang up a business that employs about 100 people. The finance director was extremely concerned. He will be required to have detailed figures on the circumstances not just of his employees but of their spouses, other members of their household, or their partners. Do we really expect finance managers, who have budgets to meet, bank managers to deal, with, customers to talk to and suppliers to visit, to ring round and find out the circumstances of each new employee?

Dawn Primarolo: No.

Mr. Paterson: I am delighted that the Minister says no; I should be grateful if she would explain the measure. Labour Members were quick to criticise the Child Support Agency: hon. Members have daily received a flood of correspondence on the problems thrown up by the CSA. The Budget requires finance directors in small businesses to take on a burden similar to that of the CSA.

I come from a rural constituency where transport is a key provision. Nothing in the Budget will be good for North Shropshire. My constituency contains 98 villages. The car, the van and the lorry are basic to the functioning of the economy, and without them it does not work. It is inconceivable that a comprehensive scheme of public transport could be created in an area such as North Shropshire, where there is economic activity in every one of those 98 villages.

Lobbing a huge increase on fuel tax will not make North Shropshire businesses competitive. The Chancellor's humbug words about competitiveness come at a time when there has been a dramatic fall in the price of crude oil from $20 to $13 a barrel. It is ridiculous to impose increases to the tune of 23p a gallon: unleaded petrol is now £3.08 a gallon. We should talk in gallons, because litre is a weasel word and conceals any increase. The increase on diesel is 29p a gallon, which is even worse. Labour Members made polite reference to my tie. This tie was transported in a van burning diesel. All hon. Members are wearing goods that were carried by road. This ludicrous prejudice against motor transport is unacceptable to me as a representative of a rural constituency.

The Budget will jack up motorists' costs by £2.75 billion. To take £30 billion a year from motorists and claim that a pathetic £50 million for rural transport will help is childish. Each bus that may be aided by that little £50 million fund should bear a memorial sticker reading, "Funded thanks to the countryside march." This is clearly a panic measure introduced as a desperate attempt to obtain a press release in rural areas. It simply will not wash.

The other big issue in Oswestry market this morning was the cost of fuel. It is a crippling tax on farmers and small businesses in my constituency, and I strongly oppose it.

Finally, I want to say something about taxation. It was clear in Prime Minister's Question Time today—revealingly—that the Prime Minister has not read his own Red Book. I remind him of the words of Lord Dunrossil, who said in the 1955 Budget debate, with admirable clarity, "all taxation is bad." We in North Shropshire have had to suffer a 13 per cent. hike in council tax because Labour Members voted for a Bill that has grossly switched funds from rural areas to northern and inner-city areas. I consider it iniquitous that Sedgefield received a 13 per cent. increase in standard spending assessment while Shropshire received only a 3 per cent. increase.

I know that others wish to speak but, before I finish my speech, I invite Labour Members who have not read it to turn to page 116 of the Red Book, which features the real bite in the Budget. There, tragically, we see taxation rising from 38.1 per cent. of gross domestic product to 40.1 per cent. in 2002–3.

In all my experience, I have never visited a country that has been over-governed, interfered with or taxed to prosperity. This is a thoroughly bad Budget for North Shropshire, and a thoroughly bad Budget for Great Britain.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak towards the end of a debate in which forceful points have been made. I am pleased to follow my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson), who has experience of the manufacturing industry—as has my hon. Friend the Member for North Norfolk (Mr. Prior).

There are Conservative Members with direct experience of manufacturing who speak with feeling and conviction about the circumstances in which industry is now being placed by the rise in interest rates, and, more particularly, the level of the exchange rate. I think that it would be wrong for us to debate the Budget without dwelling not only on the measures in it, but on the consequences for industry, particularly manufacturing industry.

Many of my hon. Friends have referred to the Chancellor's opening remarks. He said that Chancellors had a once-in-a-generation opportunity to reform tax law. The right hon. Gentleman might have referred to a once-in-a-cycle opportunity; once in a generation might be stating it a bit too strongly. This Budget, however, was characterised, both before and during its presentation, by what is colloquially known as hype—much of which was not subsequently found to be justified.

In so far as the Chancellor had a once-in-a-cycle opportunity to reform tax law, I fear that he did not take it. He took only part of the opportunity, in relation to welfare reform. I shall say more about that later. I feel, however, that, at this stage in the economic cycle—with the benefit of the dramatic increases in tax receipts that occurred both last year and this—he had a once-in-a-cycle opportunity to achieve a one-off downward shift in the proportion of gross domestic product taken in tax.

Alternatively, if it was to be taken in tax, it could have been used in a way that, in the longer term, would reduce the extent to which the public sector had to meet future obligations. Damagingly, however, there was no evidence of that—quite the reverse.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) forcefully mentioned at Prime Minister's Question Time, table 3.3 of the Red Book, on page 48, tells us that an increase of a quarter of a million in the number of families with high marginal deduction rates occurred as a consequence of the Budget. I know that the Prime Minister was told the best figure to offer, and talked about the marginal deduction rate of 70 per cent. or more, where two thirds of people have the effective marginal deduction rate reduced. None the less, paying 60 per cent. or more as an effective tax rate is a high figure for 1 million-plus families, an increase of 250,000 families. As a consequence of the Budget and of the withdrawal of benefit, they are brought into a situation, effectively, of welfare dependency and relatively high marginal tax rates.

Dawn Primarolo: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that he is missing the point, because all those families will be better off as a result of the working families tax credit and child care tax credit? He has not made any reference to that at all.

Mr. Lansley: The Financial Secretary is being uncharacteristically ungenerous to me, in that I had only started, and was certainly planning to come on to the working families tax credit.

I make no bones about it: it has to be proven whether the working families tax credit is an improvement on family credit, but, when one makes the comparison, one has to take into account the fact that the working families tax credit and the child care credit in particular, which goes alongside it, are going to consume—well, the Financial Secretary will know the numbers, I hope, better than me, as the Red Book is in her name. I will not do her the injustice of suggesting that she did not read it before she published it.

We are talking of £2.5 billion extra in total costs, including tax credits, going through this system. There is every possibility that, if £2.5 billion were expended even through the family credit system, it would have lifted many of those families out of some of the poverty trap consequences of the interaction between family credit and housing benefit. I do not dispute her point that those families will be better off. However, I hope that she will not dispute the fact that many of them will, as a consequence of the withdrawal threshold and the withdrawal of credit over £90, effectively pay quite a high marginal rate of tax as their earnings increase.

Dawn Primarolo: There have been many references by Conservative Members to the Institute for Fiscal Studies. Will the hon. Gentleman welcome the fact that the institute agrees with the Treasury, and that the Chancellor's Budget proposals have reduced the number of people who face very high marginal rates of tax—that is, above 70 per cent.—by over two thirds, reducing the worst effects of the poverty trap?

Mr. Lansley: I am sorry that I did not explain myself. I thought that I had made precisely that point. Far from missing that point, I had acknowledged that, as table 3.3 shows, the number of families affected by 70 per cent.-plus marginal rates of tax has been reduced by two thirds.

However, I also make the point, which is made in the same table—which the Financial Secretary published—that, at the 60 per cent. rate of withdrawal, the figure goes up from 750,000 to more than 1 million. Therefore, one has to take those two points together and balance them. It would not be reasonable to take one without the other.

[Mr. Lansley]

May I characterise the Budget overall? When I had an exchange with the right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster)—he will forgive me if I have got his constituency wrong—

Mr. Derek Foster indicated dissent.

Mr. Lansley: Good. I would not like to commit an indiscretion and get the constituency wrong.

When the right hon. Gentleman was speaking, he was kind enough to give way to me. The impression I gained from his answer was that he felt that the Budget had gone well.

When talking about the work of Finance Ministers, a French Finance Minister said that the art was to pluck the goose with the least amount of hissing. The impression I got from the right hon. Gentleman was that he felt that the Chancellor had got away with plucking the goose with relatively little hissing. I must remind him that all past evidence suggests that the goose does not hiss straight away; it can take time. The right hon. Gentleman ought to consider the Budget carefully and remember the old saying, which is a bit of a cliché, that the Budget that is cheered on the day is the Budget that people are sorry about some time later.

I shall trespass on the patience of the House further, if I may, and refer again to table B8 on page 116, which my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) also mentioned. It is significant that the tax burden will rise, and the table shows an increase from 38.1 per cent. of GDP to 40.1 per cent. by 2002–03.

Two other rather more significant political facts are also to be gleaned from that table. First, the bulk of the increase occurs between 1996–97 and 1998–99. We are now in the throes of a substantial increase, by more than 1.5 percentage points, in the amount of GDP taken in tax, at a time when total GDP has been growing relatively strongly—certainly in the early part of that period, although less so now.

That implies that the Budgets of last July and of yesterday are impacting in the short term to increase taxes substantially, yet there is no offsetting reduction in the tax burden that will come later. As successive Budgets come along, and the Chancellor feels that he has to assuage the demands, not least by Labour Members, for public expenditure, we shall find that the tax burden continues to rise beyond the figures in the table.

There is a second interesting point in the table. When we look at the disaggregation between different kinds of taxes, we see that the biggest increases are not in corporation tax. As we know, there have been changes in corporation tax and large cash flows out of industry in tax because of the consequences of changes in ACT, but also some offset through the reduction in the main rate.

The biggest increases as a proportion of GDP are in income tax, which increases from 9.5 per cent. at the beginning of the period to 11.1 per cent. at the end, and in excise duties, which rise from 4.1 per cent. to 4.8 per cent. That is pretty significant, because for the poor benighted goose—that is, in this context, the personal sector that pays taxes—it is through income tax and excise duties that the pain of taxation is felt.

Over the next two or three years, we shall find that it is in precisely those areas of personal taxation and excise duties that the public will begin to feel the costs beginning to flow through to them, and they will not be remotely sanguine about the Chancellor's Budgets.

The Chancellor has gone for a Budget designed in the main to make everybody feel good. It is a "feel-good Budget", because it would be difficult to object to help for families as the centrepiece of a Budget. However, over time, that feel-good factor will be translated, in the individual personal circumstances of families, into a judgment about whether they will lose in the long run, and whether they blame the Chancellor for the changes in their personal disposable income. Labour Members will learn painfully, as the Conservative party learned in government, that it is not the spin doctors who get one into or out of trouble, but performance, economic management and outturns.

At the heart of the Budget is the problem that such things will turn out badly for the Chancellor, not least in that people's net disposable income will not in future reach the levels they had hoped for.

The Chancellor talks of suppressing wage inflation and trying to hold down increases in wages. No doubt that will happen, as many people will be chasing fewer jobs when the jobs market is depressed by the recession in manufacturing, the impact of the national minimum wage and other factors. Moreover, the Chancellor will take a greater proportion of whatever money they earn.

It might be interesting to consider the Labour party manifesto, as Labour Members have so much to say about it. The manifesto states:

> "How and what governments tax sends clear signals about the economic activities they believe should be encouraged or discouraged."

The Chancellor's past two Budgets have sent us a very clear message: he wants to discourage profits. Profits will take the pain of the Budget, because of the disadvantages of the ACT change to cash flow, which will be hit hard. Presumably, because of his reduction in the married couples' allowance, the Chancellor wants also to discourage marriage. By his own admission, if he wants to tax something, he wants to discourage it.

Like many Opposition Members, I was worried that the Chancellor seemed to take it for granted that, in the long run, taxing child benefit for higher earners would be the right thing to do. A strong point was made earlier in the debate about the character of child benefit and the fact that it was introduced to replace a tax allowance. Therefore, by extension, the idea is illogical that child benefit received by higher-rate taxpayers should be taxed away, as the benefit was designed to replace a tax allowance that recognised, in the benefit system, the cost of looking after children. The benefit also reflected the value that all stratums of society place on bringing up children.

Undermining the universality of those benefits would be regrettable. There are few instances in which a single benefit can so readily and generally be targeted against those sections in society where costs fall, where poverty or financial hardship arise, and where, very often, child benefit plays a particularly valuable part in family incomes and in ensuring that sometimes relatively low-earning wives of high-earning husbands have an addition to their income that is expressly available to them, for spending on their children.

The shift from family credit to working families tax credit has already been dealt with in the debate, so I shall not dwell on it. However, if it is the centrepiece of the Budget and a key welfare-to-work policy, two questions arise.

First, how can the Government present a Budget containing such a major measure, but not present that measure within the context of the Government's overall welfare reforms? Why has not the Government's Green Paper on welfare reform been presented either before or with the Budget, so that we might understand whether—somewhere in the structure of their welfare reform—there are elements to off-set significantly increased welfare expenditure and extension of dependency to higher-earning families? If the measure falls within the context—as I should certainly hope that it does—of wider welfare reforms promoting self-provision and acting to stem otherwise longer-term growth in liabilities in the welfare budget, we were not told about it. That is a pity.

Secondly, how will the measure—particularly the child care tax credit—impact on demand for work? As has already been briefly mentioned in the debate, it is not at all obvious that the measure's consequence will be to enable many women to look for work who were previously unable to do so for financial reasons. There are several reasons for that consequence.

First, a substantial part of the measure's impact may be to persuade currently working mothers that it is better to take part-time rather than full-time employment because of the extent to which additional earnings will be clawed back with withdrawal of the credit.

Secondly, the measure may create circularity within communities, in which substantial benefit is derived from looking after one another's children rather than one's own children. Everyone registers as a child minder; everyone receives their £150; and everyone claims back their £105. We might create some rather closed circles of people taking in, as it were, each other's washing, but not create any net external benefit to the economy.

I do not dispute that families with children will derive financial benefits from the process by virtue of the taxpayer subsidy, but that does not mean that some of the claimed benefits for the wider economy will necessarily be achieved. Even if, as a consequence, a larger active population seeks work, it does not follow that the number of jobs available in the economy and the number of people entering work will increase.

Let us remember how the process works. If labour supply in the marketplace increases, demand is normally stimulated by a reduction in the price of labour. Yet we know that, by the time the measure is introduced, the Labour Government will have introduced a national minimum wage. Thus the price of labour will not be able to adjust downwards in order to encourage employers' demand for it. Employers may find that more people are seeking work, but that it is not necessarily in their economic interest to take those people into work. The net consequence will be rises in unemployment, not necessarily rises in employment.

I shall quote again from the Labour manifesto, just to see whether I can keep irritating the Labour party:

"An explicit objective of a Labour government will be to raise the trend rate of growth".

It struck me that, when the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) was responding to the Budget in the debate on 30 October 1996, he criticised the then recovery because it was not investment-led or manufacturing-led, but was too much consumption-led. Yet we have the same now. There is a failure in investment, and a failure to support manufacturing so that it can lead the recovery on the part of the Government.

The right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East has reduced his expectations for the trend rate of growth. I shall not bore the House with the figures—suffice it to say that the rate is predicted to go down to 2 per cent. or below in 1999, compared with well over 3 per cent. in the early part of 1997.

A whole page of the Red Book is devoted to an apologia for the Government not achieving the investment-led growth they were anticipating. Business investment is predicted to fall from a 7.75 per cent. increase in 1997 to 4.5 per cent. to 5 per cent. in 1998, to 3 per cent. to 3.5 per cent. in 1999 and to 2.5 per cent to 3 per cent. in 2000. Far from investment driving forward, it will not sustain the economic cycle. The Treasury is making its excuses for the trend rate of growth not being higher. It says that the level of investment in capital productivity is not sufficient to achieve it.

I conclude with two specific points. The first relates to health spending; it is something of a pedant's point. It is very strange that the Government have found that, towards the end of the financial year, principally as a result of demand-led expenditure not coming up to predictions, £1.5 billion will be left over.

The proper way for the Government to proceed would be to reduce public borrowing in this financial year by £1.5 billion. Then, if they wanted, they could raise public spending next year above the pre-existing control total by £1.5 billion. It is a bogus manoeuvre to carry forward the money from 1997-98 to 1998-99. All they are doing is pretending that there will be less public spending next year and more public borrowing this year—which they will be able to reduce next year. It is a device to massage the figures for the Government's benefit—a bogus device.

I am pleased to see an Education Minister on the Government Front Bench. Yesterday afternoon, not exactly under cover of darkness but under cover of the Budget, the Government pushed out an announcement on Oxford and Cambridge college fees. I have the honour to represent two Cambridge colleges. The Government's decision was regrettable. From 1999, it could take more than 8 per cent. of the value of the addition to college fees, year by year, from the additional grant.

The Government talk about excellence, and announce a university challenge based on research excellence, but they hit at part of the independence of colleges in Cambridge and Oxford that has been at the heart of the maintenance of standards and excellence in those two fine institutions. It is a disappointment to Cambridge university. It will also be a disappointment to many in the House and beyond. It is a pity that the Government chose so transparently to push the measure out at a time that suggested that they were ashamed of their plan.

The measure was in the character of the Budget, which is more redistributive and egalitarian than the Government would have people believe. Sometimes, the net result of egalitarianism is not to benefit those whom it is intended to make prosper, but to diminish us all—and to diminish our economic prospects.

[Mr. Lansley]

That brings me back to my goose. The Chancellor was able to call on many golden eggs that have been laid by the goose of economic prosperity created by the previous Conservative Administration. He has set about strangling that goose, after having gently plucked it.

9.11 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): I recall an amusing book written by Jane Austen in her early days, called something along the lines of, "A Partial and Prejudiced History of England". The subtitle promises that the history will contain very few dates. I hope to make a partial—but, I hope, not prejudiced—speech on the Budget that will contain very few statistics. It is more important to concentrate on the outcomes of the Budget statement than to bandy about figures in the sterile way that is so often evident in such debates.

As we have already said, the Liberal Democrats applaud many of the measures in the Budget. Many of the policies are moving in the right direction, although some are not moving far enough and others are not quite in the right direction, but veering off to one side. However, there is much to recommend and many policies that we have advocated over many years. I hope that the moves on child care are as successful as the Government intend. The reforms to national insurance, the long-overdue support for carers, the also overdue change of heart on the ISA—on which many of us have argued with Treasury Ministers—and the help for the unemployed are welcome.

The outcomes are what counts. My constituency is a genuinely rural constituency—not green welly rural, but black welly with mud on rural. The Budget will not have all the effects that the Government desire in my constituency, simply because so much is not applicable to the area. To borrow a phrase from my hon. Friend the Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders), the Budget seems to have bypassed Somerset in many ways.

There is nothing for pensioners. I have more pensioners in my constituency than the average. Nothing in the Budget commends itself to them or makes their lives easier. Instead, measures such as increases in petrol costs, which affect people on fixed incomes more than others, work in the opposite direction.

I see nothing in the Budget on housing. Housing in rural areas has been a problem for a long time. The right-to-buy policy denuded many of our villages of any social housing for ordinary people, and the housing stock tends to be older, in more exposed positions, and damp. We should have seen a Government initiative to change the structure of VAT on home insulation—not just for specific schemes, but on a wider basis—to make a real difference to the lives of many people.

Farming communities in my constituency have never had it so bad as they do now. The strong pound is a major influence on the difficulties that farmers face, yet the Budget has been judged in such a way that the pound has risen to a more unsupportable level than previously. That will make life more difficult, yet we have received no satisfaction from the Minister of Agriculture, on the specific help that he will give to the dairy or beef sectors in areas such as Somerset.

The Budget will not help the smallest businesses, although there was welcome help for smallish companies. It is hard to see where help is coming from, for the small companies in the non-incorporated sector. Some measures should not have formed part of the Budget, but should, of necessity, have formed part of the Government's overall programme—for example, the major reform of the uniform business rate, which is positively inimical to small business.

Mr. John M. Taylor (Solihull): The concept of a small business is one that we are all fond of, but it may have a plurality of definitions. What does the hon. Gentleman think is a small business?

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that there is a plurality of definitions. It depends on the context and the sector that we are talking about. I am talking about small, non-incorporated businesses, such as a lone trader, a partnership or a small retail business that has been crucified in recent years and to which the Budget is of little assistance.

I wish to refer to car tax. It is absolutely right that we should stress the difficulty in the Government's proposals. As is common knowledge, we have campaigned for a long time for a shift in taxation, so that we increase the proportion on fuel, and balance that by a substantial reduction in vehicle excise duty. That is not only environmentally friendly, but means that for many people in rural areas who depend on their cars as the principal means of transport, there is a neutrality or even a benefit because of the typical mileage done in a year.

Many households in isolated villages have to have more than one car to allow people to live a life at all. The cars tend to be older, and the people will not be helped by the speculative Government suggestion about changes in excise duty. Most important, they will not be helped by the fact that the Government have gone ahead with an increase on petrol duty immediately, but are not prepared to change vehicle excise duty for another two to three years, if at all. That is the crux of the proposals.

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay): My hon. Friend mentioned farmers, small business men and the problem of increased petrol duty, which affects tourism. He has not mentioned pensioners, but I am sure he will. [HON. MEMBERS: "Yes, he has."] Does my hon. Friend agree that, from a west country perspective, this is not a good Budget for the south-west?

Mr. Heath: I agree. My hon. Friend may have missed the passage of my speech in which I mentioned pensioners, but Ministers on the Treasury Bench have noticed that I mentioned them once or twice. He is absolutely right, however, in saying that the Budget is not good for the south-west.

I commend the Government for at least making a start on the important issue of public transport. It is extraordinary to hear Conservative Members talk about the iniquity of providing only £50 million for rural transport. Rural transport is so atrocious because of deregulation, which the Conservative Government introduced, and because they starved local authorities of money for years, so that public transport could not receive the necessary support. Nevertheless, £50 million will not go far in providing adequate support to meet the needs of people in rural areas.

The additional expenditure on the health service is welcome but, again, it does not go far enough. I am worried that, because of their pledges, the Government will concentrate on waiting lists to such an extent that there will be a reduction in primary health care and in the number of community hospitals in rural areas. Moreover, there seems to be nothing to improve policing in rural areas, which is another major issue.

My prime concern, however, is education, in which I have been involved for the past 12 years, as leader of a county council and chairman of a local education authority—it is something about which I care passionately. I welcome the extra money for education, but once the various elements—the effects of inflation and the adjustment to the deflator—have been taken into account, that money is whittled away and little benefit remains.

Setting aside the total amounts and the general picture, I must ask about the distribution of the money that will be made available. In this respect, I shall be openly parochial about Somerset. Recently, the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells), visited schools in my constituency—I hope that he liked what he saw—but those schools are working against a background of a starvation of funds that has continued year after year.

We hear the Government's rhetoric and their promises of additional money for education, but that money does not come to Somerset schools. Last year, the council tried to spend more on the education service, but it was capped—by a Labour Government applying Conservative policy. We looked to this year's local government settlement for extra expenditure, but we found a real-terms reduction. We applied for money that was released as a result of the scrapping of the assisted places scheme, but we were given nothing.

The effect is that teachers are being lost and class sizes are becoming larger. Children, including my own, in Somerset schools have seen no benefit from the change of Government; indeed, things have got worse. Until people start to notice a difference in our schools, why should they believe the Government's rhetoric?

People see that the local education authority is spending massively above its standard spending assessment—they do not doubt its commitment to education—but also that the expenditure per child is low. They also see that, on any register, the authority's efficiency is high—in Somerset, the number of vacant places is among the lowest in the country, and the administration costs per child are, by a long way, the lowest in the country. They ask why Somerset and the west country are not receiving the benefits that the Government have promised.

I make a plea to the Government. Things can only get better in Somerset. Because of the Government's commitment to Conservative spending limits, we have had 19 years of Conservative government. That is long enough, and we want a change. The Budget should have provided the opportunity to make that change—my regret is that it has failed that test.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): I begin by commiserating with the Financial Secretary, who seems to be rather light on support this evening. Three Labour Back Benchers have spoken in this debate, and two of them criticised the central macro-economic judgment of the Budget.

I have just had the pleasure of listening to five successive speeches by Conservative Members. I did not expect such a pleasure when we returned on 1 May in rather depleted numbers. There are enough Labour Members to go round, and they have just been told by the Chancellor that this is the biggest, most exciting and significant Budget for a generation, yet his performance seems to have emptied the stalls.

I cannot believe that that is because the Financial Secretary is in any way unpopular with her colleagues, so I can only conclude that it is because the Budget is unpopular with them. That is the only remaining explanation.

Mr. Blunkett: It is because they did not want to listen to you.

Mr. Willetts: The Secretary of State says rather discourteously that it is because they did not want to listen to me, but it is not as if they were in earlier and left when I arrived: they have not been around all day, and have not spoken up for the Budget.

The right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster) made it clear that he was worried about a Budget that had led to an expectation of interest rates having to rise further, leading in turn to upward pressure on the exchange rate and to a threat to manufacturing industry. That was also the central argument of the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson). Of the three Labour Back Benchers who have made speeches today, two criticised the Budget, which was meant to be a once-in-a-generation affair.

By contrast, my hon. Friends the Members for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton), for North Norfolk (Mr. Prior), for Witney (Mr. Woodward), for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) and for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) all made effective contributions.

I want to ask the Financial Secretary about the Government's commitment to what they rather pompously call "best accountancy standards" in the presentation of financial information. I want to find out to what extent she will live up to that grandiose commitment and whether she can explain the Chancellor's rather baffling passages on national insurance contributions.

The Chancellor said:

"I am abolishing the perverse entry fee that every employee pays to be part of the national insurance system and, in doing so, I am cutting national insurance for every employee in the country."

We understand that, but he went on to say:

"Further reforms will also ensure that no one pays national insurance for the first £81 of their weekly earnings. All employees earning between £64 and £81 will have their right to benefits protected."

He then said:

"So, from next April, 20 million employees in Britain will benefit by paying £1.28 a week, or £66 a year, less in national insurance."—[Official Report, 17 March 1998; Vol. 308, c. 1106.]

Because of those remarks, many newspapers claimed today that the Budget involves the lower earning limit for employees' national insurance contributions being increased from £64 to £81, but I cannot find that anywhere in the Budget arithmetic. Indeed, the paragraph about the saving of £1.28 a week refers solely to the entry fee.

[Mr. Willetts]

The Financial Secretary has put her name to a Red Book that is supposed to be committed to high standards. Where will we find in it the costing of increasing the employee's lower earnings limit from £64 a week to £81 a week? If it is not there, how will it be included in future Budget arithmetic—if, indeed, the Chancellor intends to deliver the measure?

I have some questions about the working families tax credit. The other week, I had the pleasure of listening to the Financial Secretary giving a speech on that very subject to the Fawcett Society. Unfortunately, she was not able to stay to answer detailed questions. We understand that—she was in Budget purdah and could not be drawn further. It was a desperate attempt to show that the Treasury was not being run by the lads and that people were fighting the women's corner. Now that she has the Budget out of the way, she can tell us a bit more.

My first question concerns wallet versus purse. When I was a single male policy wonk in the policy unit—probably the sort of person who is the bane of the Financial Secretary's life—I was rather keen on the earned income tax credit. One of the reasons why it did not happen was wallet versus purse. If the money was paid to the man—it still normally is the man—through the pay packet, what would be the chances of women in certain circumstances receiving the money to spend on the children?

The Government claim to have solved that problem, but it is clear from statements in the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" and elsewhere that only if both partners in the marriage agree will the money be paid to the wife, whereas, under the current arrangement, it is specified in law that the wife is the claimant, and the family credit is therefore paid to the wife unless she specifies otherwise. That is a significant change, and it is not one that is good for family life.

Mr. Blunkett: The right hon. Gentleman has had several hours to think about the question that I put to the shadow Chancellor earlier: if the Conservative party invented joint and several liability, why are Conservative Members so exercised about finding a way forward under the working families tax credit scheme, which allows us to ensure that that situation is reversed, so that we have the mirror image of it?

Mr. Willetts: That is a complete diversion from the central issue. I was raising the problem raised by the present Minister of State, Department of Social Security. As the shadow Chancellor explained, when these measures were debated last time, the Minister of State said that of course, for most families this would not be an issue—I accept that, because for most families it is not—but "we are concerned with that minority—it may or may not be substantial—of families in which money for the children is not paid over".

That is the point on which we have not had a clear response from the Government. It concerned the Minister of State 10 years ago, and it should concern the Financial Secretary now.

What about marginal rates and the notorious table 3.3 on page 48 of the FSBR, which shows that the number of families facing marginal deduction rates of 60 per cent. or more has increased from 760,000 to 1,010,000—an increase of about 250,000—under the Government's new proposals? The gain that the Government make under these proposals is that they will have got rid of the high marginal rates—those over 90 per cent.—which would largely disappear. However, the Minister must recognise that the Government are paying a high price for that.

Many families that have an income which means that they are beyond entitlement to family credit will now face withdrawal of working families tax credit combined with income tax and national insurance contributions that mean that their marginal rates will go up. Rather conveniently, the table stops at the 60 per cent. figure, when the working families tax credit taper is 55 per cent. It would be interesting if the Minister would add another line to the table and give the deduction rate at 50 per cent. or more, and give the figures both under the current and her proposed system. I fear that there will be a massive increase in the number of families facing the combined deduction rates of more than 50 per cent. That would have a serious impact on the labour market, and the Minister should deal with it in her reply.

Thirdly, on two-earner couples, family credit goes to two distinct family types at present. The first type is the married couple where the wife normally does not work; the second is the single parent. As a result of the big extension of working families tax credit, this type of assistance will for the first time go to two-earner couples. We know that working wives—it is normally the wives—are particularly sensitive to changes in marginal rates. We want some assurance from the Minister that the Government have considered seriously the implications for patterns of labour force participation of extending high marginal rates, particularly to a pattern of two-earner couples who previously did not experience such rates.

Finally, let us hear about the burdens on business—a point so ably put by my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson)—because it is a very significant issue indeed. That is the other reason why the earned income tax credit was not implemented in 1986; it was partly the feminists worried about wallet versus purse and partly businesses worried about being unpaid benefit payers as well as tax collectors for the Government.

Some curious things will happen as a result of the tax credit. Those wives who succeed in getting the credit paid directly to them will find that great, bold innovation, an Inland Revenue order book. The Inland Revenue will pay cash direct to non-working wives. I will be interested to hear how that is supposed to be delivered in practice.

I have a few questions about the Budget's child care provisions. I recognise that the child care disregard in family credit has not had a high take-up. We might expect single parent take-up to be high, but I understand that only 25 per cent. of them have taken it up, and then only for a modest amount. The Minister could go on and on about the low rate of take-up of child care disregard for family credit, but will she try to explain why she thinks it is so low? It is easy to say that it is because of the way that the system has been constructed, but is that the whole story?

Is it perhaps that families might prefer informal arrangements for child care rather than formalised ones? Many families do not want the pattern of child care which is eligible for the disregard under family credit, and which will be eligible for assistance under the new child care credit. Many families prefer the neighbours, the grandparents, the mothers-in-law or a network of people on the same estate. Either the Government will face continuing very low take-up rates or they will increase the financial pressures on such informal networks to be converted into institutional arrangements, which may not go with the grain of what many families want.

Another reason for the low take-up is that it is easy to focus on the demand side, to come to the House with ingenious ideas on vouchers, credits, benefits or tax credits that are supposed to help child care, but what about the supply side? It is difficult to set up a child care facility through a local authority planning system. What about the regulatory burden that some local authorities impose on people trying to set up such facilities? What about the way that VAT affects people who provide child care?

I will be interested to hear whether the Government have any proposals to make it easier to supply child care. If supply of child care remains restricted while demand for it is encouraged through these further incentives, the Minister will find only that the price goes up and that hefty profits are made by the small number of regulated providers who meet the requirements of her child care credit. The benefits will not go to families but will be passed on to the small number of people providing the services.

I do not want go on too long, but perhaps I can make one or two wider points. There is an old Treasury story, which I think is told of Lord Healey, although I cannot believe it is true of him.

Mr. Blunkett: It is bound to be true then.

Mr. Willetts: Who knows? Lord Healey was said to treat his speech writer rather badly. He delivered one of those speeches that we used to hear from Chancellors of the Exchequer in which he read out an account of how the British economy faced the most appalling problems and the rate of inflation, the balance of payments deficit and the public sector borrowing requirement were too high. He continued, "But this Government has a set of policies which will solve these problems." As he turned over the page, there was a note from the speech writer saying, "From now on, you are on your own".

The point is that this Government are now on their own, but it is the other way around. They have inherited a strong economy, with low unemployment and declining PSBR. They have, thank heavens, left my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) as Chancellor of the Exchequer for a while in control of public expenditure.

What do the Government get up to as soon as they are on their own? They get up to introducing expensive measures, which are carefully planned so as to avoid being counted as public expenditure. We heard how the entire new deal and welfare to work do not fall within the control total. We are told that people participating in the scheme will receive not a benefit, but an allowance equivalent to the benefit, which means that, helpfully, they do not count as unemployed for the purposes of the claimant count. Perhaps that is one of the reasons why the Government lost their nerve and decided not to change the definition of the claimant count after all.

When and if unemployment starts to rise, Ministers will discover one of the uncomfortable consequences of those expensive measures. That is what has blown apart similar schemes in Scandinavian countries where they have been tried before. When unemployment is low, it looks fine to spend large sums on a relatively small number of unemployed people and a number which, thank heavens, is falling—but wait until the cycle turns and the number of unemployed people starts to rise. Wait until the Government suddenly find that their commitments of thousands of pounds per person have to be delivered to rising numbers of unemployed people. Wait and see what the business sector will say when the corporation tax increases, which are so blatantly revealed on page 16 of the Red Book, start to bite—the transitional measures just happen to involve an extra £15 billion in corporation tax payment over the next four years.

If the economy slows down and the Government find their welfare-to-work measures costing even more and the corporate sector being squeezed between a high exchange rate and an increasing burden of corporate taxation, at that point the picture will look rather different. At that point, the Chancellor's mettle will really be tested.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Dawn Primarolo): I shall try to deal specifically with the questions asked by the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) in the short time left in the debate.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: There are 20 minutes left.

Dawn Primarolo: I do not need prompting by Conservative Members.

Those questions involved, first, purse-to-wallet transfers; secondly, marginal rates; thirdly, what happens to two-earner couples; fourthly, the burden on business; and fifthly, take-up of child credit.

It is noticeable that, for all their concerns about the independence of women, no Conservative Member has mentioned the fact that it was a Conservative Government who introduced joint and several liability for the poll tax. Despite being repeatedly asked by my right hon. Friend—[Interruption.] I am happy to discuss at any time the poll tax and the £14 billion that the Conservatives wasted on it. I paid my poll tax and I am sure that Conservative Members pay all their taxes—at least, I sincerely hope they do.

However, to return to the debate, I shall try to answer the questions asked by the hon. Member for Havant. There will be no compulsory transfer from purse to wallet. That has been made clear. Partners will be able to choose who receives the payment and we shall adapt the family credit rules. I know that the hon. Gentleman is knowledgeable about family credit, so I shall not read out the fact that couples on family credit can already choose the person to whom it should be paid. We are already looking at the family credit rules to ensure that there is no compulsory transfer from purse to wallet.

Mr. Woodward: Will the Financial Secretary give way?

Dawn Primarolo: I shall answer the five questions asked by the hon. Member for Havant and then take interventions.

On the question of marginal rates, the hon. Gentleman fundamentally misunderstands—or chooses to misunderstand—that the working families tax credit and the child care tax credit will mean that more people will gain and will be better off. That means that more people will have support from the child care credit, particularly women who do not currently receive such assistance. There was little reference during the debate to their experiences. The hon. Gentleman also asked what would happen to two-earner couples. Clearly, they can choose to whom the credit is paid.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about the burden on business. The Government are very good at consulting with business, as we have clearly shown in a number of areas—particularly regarding proposals in this Budget. We shall consult extensively with business, as we did in extending the pay-as-you-earn advice and support that business will receive from the Inland Revenue regarding the merger of the Contributions Agency into the Inland Revenue, which will reduce burdens on business.

As regards the take-up of child tax credit, the hon. Gentleman speculated about the child care strategies that families adopt. He should remember that the new deal allocates money to assist with the provision of 50,000 training places for child minders. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment will make announcements in the next few weeks about the national child care strategy on which his Department is working extremely hard. It will deliver on women's desires for a comprehensive child care strategy.

Let us look at the comments in support of the Budget. The Kids Club Network says that it is very pleased with the amount that the Chancellor has announced. It says:

"We think it is very realistic and very generous. He has listened to parents."

The Parents at Work organisation says:

"This is a major breakthrough. For the first time, the Government has recognised the high costs of child care and that they have been a real obstacle to the opportunities for women and will keep millions of children out of poverty."

The Government's proposals are widely supported and welcomed by millions of women in this country, yet no Opposition Member—with the exception of the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley)—commented on that. It speaks volumes about the lack of women on the Opposition Benches that the Opposition have failed to understand the importance of our contribution to women's lives.

Mr. Don Foster: The Minister will recall that I welcomed the Government's child care proposals—as did my hon. Friend the Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath).

The Minister referred to the Kids Club Network. Does she acknowledge that, in its remarks on the Budget, it also points out that, in order to meet the Government's aspirations, there must be an additional 90,000 qualified child minders or people in similar positions? How do the Government plan to ensure that training courses will be provided to meet that need? Under their current plans, it will take 36 years to find 90,000 additional child minders.

Dawn Primarolo: The Government are aware of the scale of the problem that we are facing as a result of the neglect by the previous Government in making any investment in child care. We clearly need a longer-term strategy. This is only one Budget, which simply lays the foundations for our policy. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has made it clear that we must develop a five-year strategy. He will set out that strategy and how it will be achieved.

In spite of all their scoffing, Conservative Front-Bench Members when in government failed absolutely to put in place any training or provide any child care places. They did not give any support to women who were excluded from the work force because of the lack of available child care places—and now they laugh at us.

Mr. Willetts: I ask the Minister to clarify one point. She repeated one sentence from the Government's document on the working families tax credit and said that there will be no compulsory transfer of resources from women to men. The next sentence says that couples will have the right to elect to whom the credit is paid—the man or the woman. Is the Minister saying that the woman who is currently the claimant of family credit has the right of veto—yes or no?

Dawn Primarolo: I made it clear that couples can elect to do either. The payment can go to the woman. The transfer of the rules from family credit into the working families tax credit will need to be fine-tuned.

The Government have laid down the principles for the operation of the working families tax credit. I will take no lectures from Conservative Members about the benefits for women. For 18 years, they forced women back into the home unpaid, drove down their wages, created an insecure labour market, made no investment in child care and left women on their own struggling; yet they now claim to be the guardians of women. That will not wash, and that is why the reports in the press today welcome the Government's proposals.

Various other issues were raised in the debate. For all that Conservative Members have said, small business reaction to the Budget has been favourable.

Mr. Paterson rose—

Dawn Primarolo: I will give way in a moment.

Small businesses welcomed the Budget. They said:

"The Chancellor has delivered a Budget for both employers, employees and consumers. Small businesses with long-term investment will benefit. More people will be encouraged into the jobs market and at the same time consumers will have more money in their pocket."

Those were presumably not the small businesses in the hon. Gentleman's constituency to which he spoke on the telephone this morning. Perhaps he could tell us what his party's policies are to help business, if he does not support what the Government have done.

Mr. Paterson: I can inform the Minister that the Federation of Small Businesses, to which I spoke this morning, is extremely concerned about the cost and difficulty of administering the new scheme. Will she please give me an answer to my question, which was posed by the financial director I mentioned, who reckons that he will have to take on one extra person purely to administer all the extra paper required by the new scheme? From a sedentary position, the Minister said no. I should be grateful if she would answer in detail from a standing position, so that I can tell the financial director tomorrow morning.

Dawn Primarolo: The hon. Gentleman can tell the financial director tomorrow morning that the Government will be consulting business on the administration of the working families tax credit, and that the Government's track record is to reduce the burdens on business, not to increase them.

I urge the hon. Gentleman to read the press release put out today by the Federation of Small Businesses. It welcomed the merger of the Contributions Agency and the Inland Revenue as a help to business. It welcomed the inheritance tax threshold being raised to £223,000, and the employers' start to national insurance contributions being raised to £81.

The Federation of Small Businesses welcomed the 40 per cent. first-year capital allowances; the Inland Revenue's new role to assist businesses in setting up payrolls for their employees; and the downward taper on charging capital gains tax. It welcomed the review of national insurance contributions paid by the self-employed; the review of industrial and commercial use of energy to gauge the method of taxation; and the £50 million venture capital fund to invest in small businesses.

Mr. Paterson rose—

Dawn Primarolo: While I am on the subject of what was welcomed—the hon. Gentleman can address himself to this, from a standing position—today the UK's bus and coach industry welcomed the Chancellor's decision to give an immediate cash injection of £50 million to rural transport. In a second press release entitled "Tax break joy for buses and coaches", the industry welcomed the Government's restoration of the bus fuel duty rebate. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman wishes to reply to that point.

Mr. Paterson: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way a second time. Will she please tell us who will analyse the status and the affairs of the relations of employees in small businesses?

Dawn Primarolo: I advise the hon. Gentleman to go and lie down in a dark room, rest for a little bit and then familiarise himself with the current family credit scheme. If he then re-reads the proposals in the Budget, he will be suitably embarrassed by the ridiculousness of his proposition. He would do well to take lessons from the shadow Chancellor, who, when asked to comment on why he would not be putting forward any alternatives to the Budget, particularly on employment creation, told The Independent on Sunday that that would be difficult at the moment because it "would be bad for our party."

He said that it would divide them, and would only reopen discussions about what their policy should have been at the last election.

The Budget that my right hon. Friend put before the House yesterday cut taxes for all employees and helped families with business. It particularly assisted the 20 per cent. of the poorest families with children, who will gain on average £490 a year. Over the next two years, families with children will gain up to £1,500. No family earning less than £220 a week will pay income tax. Any family with a full-time worker is now guaranteed a take-home pay of at least £180 a week. Couples with two children, on an income below £17,000 a year, will receive 70 per cent. of their eligible child care costs. That is a first, and it will improve the opportunities for parents, particularly women, to return to the labour market, and ensure that people are lifted out of the poverty trap.

Mr. Lansley: Will the Financial Secretary now answer this question? The Chancellor of the Exchequer said yesterday:

"Further reforms will . . . ensure that no one pays national insurance for the first £81 of their weekly earnings."—[Official Report, 17 March 1998; Vol. 308, c. 1106.]

The Red Book, at paragraph 3.31, says:

"The lower earnings limit for employees will remain unchanged (at £64 in 1998–99)."

Which is accurate?

Dawn Primarolo: I have just covered that point. I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman was listening, so I shall repeat it. There is a tax cut for all employees who pay national insurance contributions—a gain of more than £65 a year.

The hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Townend) referred to smuggling. The Government announced a wide-ranging review in the Budget last July, to look at smuggling and fraud involving alcohol and tobacco. The Government take the effects of smuggling and fraud extremely seriously, which is why the review was set up. We continue to take action to crack down on smuggling and on the criminals who take part in this pernicious activity. We will not let up in our efforts to stop smuggling and smugglers, and our efforts are increasingly successful. The House can rest assured that we will act to make life even more uncomfortable for those who flout the law and defraud the honest taxpayer.

I am disappointed that the comments from the trade today appear to condone smuggling. Mr. David Swan of the Tobacco Manufacturers Association said:

"We estimate that more than a million smokers are already buying black market cigarettes and tobacco."

Gallaher said:

"This is a green light for bootleggers."

The Wine and Spirits Association said that this is a "crime-boosting Budget." The Brewers and Licensed Retailers Association said that the Budget

"sends a clear signal to criminals that crime really pays."

Those comments are irresponsible. There is no change in tobacco duty until 1 December, no change in alcohol duty until 1 January, and no change in spirit duty at all. It is unacceptable for those organisations to encourage people to believe that duty has already been increased.

This is a Budget for stability, for reform of the tax system and for a modern welfare state that lifts people out of poverty rather than trapping them in it. We want a modern economy, modern schools and modern hospitals in an environment where investment and reform go hand in hand. It is a Budget for enterprise, for families and for a safer environment. It is a Budget for the future, and casts off the doubts, insecurities and the poverty of the past that were created by the Conservative party in government.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

Domestic Violence

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Robert Ainsworth.]

10 pm

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): I am grateful for the opportunity of this Adjournment debate. At first sight, it has little or nothing in common with the Budget debate, but having listened for the best part of three hours to hon. Members discussing the conflict between the wallet and the purse and gender conflicts over finance, I realise that there is a direct link between the Budget debate and a discussion about what happens when families break down.

Like many Adjournment debates, this is prompted by a local constituency concern, although it has wider implications. My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) and I represent the borough of Richmond. Like many boroughs, it established 10 years ago a forum for domestic violence under the police-community consultative group. More recently, it established a women's information centre to deal with domestic violence. I have been increasingly involved in the centre's work, and as a result have been educated on some of these problems, and have drawn several conclusions.

I have been struck by the fact that the women's information centre is an extremely valuable and important part of the local community. It handles roughly 1,300 cases a year, and is vastly over-subscribed. The professions who work there have a hand-to-mouth existence. They devote an enormous amount of their time to fund raising and to fighting their way through the thickets of the different agencies that are responsible for women's welfare. The system for dealing with cases of domestic violence does not work.

Having become involved in the work of the forum and the women's centre, I have learnt at first hand the horrific statistics and facts about domestic violence, of which I suspect many people are unaware. It is now well established that about one in 10 women are victims of physical violence that leads to hospitalisation. Domestic violence is mostly against women: there is some violence against men, but it is a small problem. About one in three women experience some form of violence; about one in eight experience violence throughout their relationship; and about two in every five murders of women are the result of disputes involving domestic violence—roughly one every three days. Those are horrific statistics.

It is important to have this debate not only to highlight my constituency concern and the work and problems of the local women's groups, but to give the Government an opportunity to explain how they intend to approach this problem. I am well aware that this problem has a history: it did not suddenly arise.

For the best part of two decades, women's groups have established refuges, and public consciousness of this matter has gradually increased. In 1993, the Select Committee on Home Affairs produced a valuable report, which provided many of the recommendations on which current policy is based. The 1995 inter-agency report from the Home Office took the matter one stage further, as did the family law reform in 1996. We are dealing with an incremental process.

I thought it important—given that a new Government were in office, and given the possibility of a burst of energy and reforming zeal—that some outstanding points on the agenda would now be tackled. In the rest of the time left to me, I want to suggest—in an aggregate sense, and subsequently in more specific ways—some of the problems that I hope the Government will tackle. I am glad that both the key Ministers have taken the trouble to be here.

I feel that two key philosophical points need to be made. First, it should be recognised—I think that such recognition is now widespread, but the need for it should be reiterated—that we are dealing with a serious crime. Domestic violence is not just an accident or a faux pas; it is a crime. It has taken a long time for that to be accepted. It is rather like drunken driving or rape, in that it is a crime that needs to be punished. It needs to be dealt with appropriately by the courts, and by the judicial process generally.

The other point is more subtle, and perhaps less generally appreciated. It is much better to deal with matters such as this with preventive action than to deal with them subsequently. I have been staggered by the vast amount of public resources absorbed by problems of domestic violence that, with a little imagination, and perhaps better policy, could have been avoided.

A valuable study conducted in Hackney—I am sure that the Minister is aware of it—suggests that some £5 million a year is spent as a result of domestic violence being unchecked, the subsequent action by social services departments and the necessary process in the courts. It has been estimated that the aggregate cost in London is about £300 million. That expenditure is not necessary, and it could be avoided if policy were approached in a slightly different way. Let me suggest a few ways in which we could deal with the problem.

I want to concentrate on funding. Ministers may imagine that, as a Liberal Democrat, I will suggest a new tranche of public expenditure, but that is not my objective. I recognise that there is already quite a lot of public expenditure in this area; the issue is how to use that expenditure better within existing budgets.

As one who has come to the problem from outside, I am struck by the number of agencies that exist. There is the safer cities programme, to which some boroughs have access and some do not; there is the single regeneration budget; there is the national lottery, which is available to some parts of the country but not others.

The women's refuges—I have discussed the matter with them—are in the extraordinary position of having to deal with some 25 different revenue streams, potentially, in order to fund their activities. The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions provides quite a few; the Department of Health provides others. I do not know whether the Minister knows this, but I gather that one of the key services—the help line—is due to finish on 31 March as a result of the ending of the Department of Health grant.

The issue, however, is not simply one of money being available or not available. It is about the vast complexities of funding in the sector, and about ways of reducing those complexities. Let me make some specific suggestions.

First, the Home Office could simply keep track of all the expenditure, some of which is in the domestic violence budget and some of which is not. That would give us a comprehensive picture of how much was being spent, where it was going and why it was being allocated.

My second suggestion rather goes against the grain of my belief in the unshackling of local government. I think that, as long as we have capping and close central direction, some ring fencing of central Government money may be a helpful way of dealing with such matters. For example, specific allocation of social services training funds to domestic violence would be one way of ensuring that all boroughs had access to proper funding. Alternatively, money could be ring-fenced for special provision for looking after children in refuges. I know that that is another concern of the women's movement. Ring fencing could also apply more generally to refuges.

Those are all temporary fixes, however. My main recommendation in regard to funding is that it would be very desirable if the Government arranged for the Home Office to have a fund—a pot of money—for which different projects could compete in an open market and a transparent process.

That was the main concern of the groups in Twickenham. They are not asking for more money or for the Minister to take out his cheque book. They ask for a clear process in which they can compete on merit with other projects for a pot of Home Office money that is available to all parts of the country, and demonstrate the merit of their work. In that way, they could provide some sustainable long-term funding for their activities.

One of the key criteria in judging access to that pot of funding, which could be existing money that is put under a different heading, is that projects should be preventive, rather than dealing with problems after they have already occurred. I hope that the Minister will seriously consider that point.

The other sets of recommendations are not to do with money—I am sure that they have already been debated within Government. The first involves public awareness. Over the past few years, there has been a campaign, directed almost exclusively at women, under the heading, "Don't stand for it". One could argue that the audience should be men rather than women, but the campaign has raised awareness. Much has been done, but it is clear that much more could be done, in terms of good leadership from the Government and to increase public awareness.

Let me take a few examples. As I understand it, few hospital accident and emergency wards collect statistics on injuries sustained as a result of domestic violence. That information is vital to get a picture of how serious the problem is and the type of families that are most vulnerable. However, at no stage, as far as I am aware, has any effort been made to make the Department of Health conduct that sort of statistical collection.

It is clear to those of us who work closely with the police that, in recent years, their awareness of these problems has enormously improved. Just as with race relations, the police are among the more sophisticated agencies in dealing with these problems, but there is an enormous gap between the best police officers, who are, in many ways, probably the best agents, and the worst, where the canteen culture is still alive. A lot more needs to be done with the police.

The same is true of the judiciary. I am talking not about the crass judges who think that a good beating may be the best way of dealing with a domestic situation, but more sophisticated problems of how judges deal with the award of access to children in a situation of domestic violence. Those are the sort of issues that need to be discussed with the professionals and that I suspect have not been adequately dealt with.

Finally, a whole raft of legal initiatives could be taken forward by a Government who were determined to be innovative and to reform in this sector. They already have the Family Law Act 1996 to build on, but a whole set of other things seem highly relevant. It appears that a woman who is not on benefit would have to pay, for example, about £1,000 to get a court injunction to stop her partner committing violence. Access to the courts is extremely difficult.

Legal innovation is possible in another area. We could borrow from some of the experience in the United States. There is, I think, a well-known experiment in Duluth, Minnesota, where victimless prosecution is being launched. The woman is not required to go through the whole process of enacting her horrific experiences, but the police take a proactive role in prosecution.

Probably the key issue, and one that my constituents have raised with me directly, is the role of the Crown Prosecution Service. It is notorious that very serious offences, including grievous bodily harm, are downgraded to lower charges, so that they can be taken through lower courts, probably for genuinely intelligent reasons of trying to increase the chances of securing a conviction. However, that effectively undermines the seriousness of the crime. I hope that that is something else that the Government, in their review of legal processes, will consider carefully.

I thank the Government for taking a close interest in the debate. I hope that they will exercise some leadership. I particularly hope that they will reconsider funding, which is excessively complicated and creates serious barriers to some agencies at grass-roots level, such as those in my constituency that are trying to work in this sector. I hope that the Government will make a fresh attempt to examine some of the consciousness-raising and legal reform issues that are at the heart of this complex and tragic problem.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Alun Michael): There is a tradition in the House of congratulating any hon. Member who is successful in obtaining an Adjournment debate. On this occasion, however, I would rather congratulate the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) on the use that he has made of the debate, and on his constructive and thoughtful contribution, to which I am delighted to be able to respond positively.

I am also pleased that the hon. Gentleman noticed that, as well as my being here to answer the debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms Ruddock), the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security and Minister for Women, is also present. The existence of my hon. Friend's role, and the close co-operation that we are giving to the task of examining domestic violence and other violence against women, illustrate the Government's approach and the importance that we attach to the issue.

[Mr. Alun Michael]

The hon. Gentleman was right to describe the statistics as horrific, because domestic violence continues to be the single most common form of violence against women, accounting for 17 per cent. of all violent incidents recorded by the 1996 British crime survey.

Recent new research published by Crime Concern reports that, in some parts of Britain, one woman in nine are the victims of severe beatings by partners each year. That is slightly worse than the statistics that the hon. Gentleman cited. He was right to say that domestic violence must be regarded, and underlined, as a serious crime, rather than, as it was in the past, as less serious than other forms of violence.

The hon. Gentleman stressed the need for prevention, which touches on one, indeed two, of the Government's major themes in dealing with crime. One of our favourite themes is to prevent crime wherever possible, and we are considering all sorts of ways of creating partnerships to understand and deal with the problems of crime at local level. The second is the idea of dealing with problems quickly when they arise—to nip things in the bud rather than allowing them to drift on for a long time until they become so serious that nobody can ignore them.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the value of voluntary organisations, many of which make a tremendous contribution to publicising the issues and in giving help, support and advice to people who find no help elsewhere. They also help in developing the forum activities that have helped with exchanges of views, with the education of the public, and with mutual education about how to tackle the problems.

I certainly agreed when the hon. Gentleman said that the process of growing awareness of the problem of domestic violence had been slow. That growth in awareness has been inexorable, but it has taken place over a long period. Awareness is far greater among the police than it was a few years ago, and most police forces now have carefully thought-out policies, and work much more closely with local welfare organisations and voluntary organisations representing women. None the less, they are aware that they still need to do more. That sensitivity, plus the will to continue to improve their standard of response, is the keynote for the future.

The hon. Gentleman showed great financial restraint, for a Liberal Democrat. He did not spend the same penny again and again, and tell us that we simply needed to re-order the money already available. He was right to say that there is a variety of sources, and that the availability of finance is complex, and it is difficult to find a way through. The trouble is that changing funding is complex, too, and if we are not careful we could accidentally shut off the sources of supply to some valuable organisations.

Some sources of funding, such as single regeneration budgets, already embed concern about issues of violence, including domestic violence, within a wider context. It is important to see domestic violence not as existing in a backwater but as part of the wider picture of society in terms of dealing with crime and with other social problems.

I underline a very clear theme in the Crime and Disorder Bill—which is currently wending its way through another place, and will soon reach this House—which is a local partnership approach in identifying local problems of crime. Such an approach must include identifying the local nature and profile of crimes of domestic violence, promoting the joint responsibility of police and local authorities to identify those problems in a crime and disorder audit, and considering not only statistics but people's experience—by working with voluntary organisations and those with direct experience—to get to grips with the reality of domestic violence and produce a strategy to deal locally with crimes and the causes of crime.

The hon. Member for Twickenham also mentioned the courts. There are many ways in which domestic violence issues are dealt with in the courts, and he was right to seek both simplification of that process and improved access to the courts. The Government believe strongly in such improvements. However, we are looking also for ways in which we might deal with the gaps in legislation.

For many years, we campaigned for legislation to deal with stalking. We were delighted to be able shortly after the general election to implement the Protection from Harassment Act 1997. Precisely in accordance with a belief in prevention rather than cure, the Act goes rather wider than its title might suggest, by allowing a variety of forms of harassment to be dealt with.

An order may be granted, for example, on the basis of evidence not only from the victim but from professional witnesses, thereby allowing certain activities to be forbidden. Serious criminal penalties may apply to the breach of an order. We are including similar provisions in the Crime and Disorder Bill, and are generally improving legislation to make our systems work well.

Downgrading cases is always a difficulty, and the matter requires much attention. One way of dealing with it is an improved relationship between police and the Crown Prosecution Service. My right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney–General is pushing through reforms on the matter as quickly as possible. The reforms will lead to an improvement generally in how crime is prosecuted, and will provide significant benefits in dealing with domestic violence and violence against women.

It is certainly true that violence against women remains a blot on society, and that tackling it must be a priority. We must not tolerate a culture in which it is accepted, or in which its victims are afraid to speak out. The hon. Member was right to say that, although things have improved, there is still acceptance of violence in some areas and in some cultures. I have been working with my hon. Friend the Minister for Women because of concerns about that situation. Moreover, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security and Minister for Women recently announced in the House a national strategy to tackle all forms of violence against women.

We are certainly determined that domestic violence will be dealt with effectively. To that end, Home Office Ministers are working with Ministers from other Departments to review all policies dealing with domestic violence. The hon. Member rightly said that men can be victims of domestic violence. Although that matter should not be overlooked, a person's sex is a significant factor in the likelihood of his or her being a victim or perpetrator of domestic violence, and in the seriousness and impact of domestic violence attacks. We must therefore concentrate on the experiences of women.

Tackling domestic violence—both causes and effects—is a huge task, and much of the work will have to fall to local agencies. However, Government have a part to play. We provide court funding to the Women's Aid Federation in England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, and revenue funding for women's refuge spaces. Through the special grants programme, we have made funds available to the Women's Aid Federation (England) to develop training opportunities, resources and facilities for local refuges. Other funding supports projects in Scotland and Wales. Local projects in England are funded through the single regeneration budget challenge fund.

Future funding issues are being examined in the context of the increased priority being given to the matter by the Government, and the interdepartmental strategies that are being developed to combat domestic violence through both prevention, and information and support for those who have already been victims. It is very important that the issue is dealt with across Government; it is not an issue just for one Department—not even the Home Office, with its responsibilities for crime or the Department of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, given her concern for women's issues.

All colleagues in all Departments need to recognise the relevance of health, education, local government and a variety of Government responsibilities to deal with the matter. We are at the moment looking very carefully at the best way of developing a new interdepartmental campaign of information and publicity to ensure coherence that aids understanding, so that people know how and where to get help.

I should mention—the hon. Member for Twickenham mentioned the domestic violence help line—that we have recently given the Women's Aid Federation (England) extra funding to enable it to continue to run the domestic violence help line. The federation will have financial difficulties in the coming year, as I was told when I met its representatives earlier in the week, but it is looking for ways to continue to run the operation. Very often, due to the patchwork of provision, people need somewhere nationally to go, if only to ask where they can get help and be given advice.

We said in opposition that care and concern for victims would be one of our priorities in government. That is absolutely right. There needs to be a switch in the attention that the criminal justice system, as well as the public service, gives to needs of victims. Within weeks of coming to office, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister kept that promise by announcing an increase of £1 million a year for Victim Support, which will enable it to establish a national telephone help line for victims of crime, and to develop its court-based and local services.

On 1 October 1997, to help victims further, we brought into force the provisions of part IV of the Family Law Act 1996. That is a very important enactment, which provides strengthened powers of arrest where violence is used or threatened. It also amends the Children Act 1989, so that, when an emergency protection order or an interim care order is made for the protection of children, an exclusion order can be attached, permitting the removal from the home of the suspected abuser, rather than the removal of the child. Those provisions are important.

Partnership between agencies at a local level is extremely important. I have already referred to the partnership required between local authorities and the police in developing local crime prevention partnerships. We certainly expect the crime audit required under the Crime and Disorder Bill to identify the level of domestic violence in an area. Local partnerships will be required to develop a strategy for addressing it in the wider strategy for crime reduction needed in the area.

In June, we set up an interdepartmental review to identify ways of improving the situation of all vulnerable witnesses. That includes victims of domestic violence—although it includes a number of others as well. Sometimes people are affected by domestic violence but not in ways that are easily recognised. I am thinking of adults with learning difficulties, disabled people, and people who have speech difficulties or language problems. For that reason, the review is very wide-ranging, and will consider the whole process from the investigation to the trial and beyond. It looks at the role of many of the agencies and professionals involved.

There are many issues to be addressed. Many, if not all, are relevant to the needs of victims of domestic violence, among the ranks of vulnerable witnesses and defendants. Such people have a right not to be intimidated. Unfortunately, some of the weakest and most vulnerable in our society have found it most difficult to see a fair trial. We expect to receive the working group's report very shortly. We shall certainly want to respond to it as quickly and as positively as possible. It will make a considerable contribution to improving the standard of justice.

The hon. Member for Twickenham has opened a wide-ranging debate. Indeed, the subject would have justified a debate of hours rather than half an hour. I congratulate him on packing a great deal into his speech, and I hope that I have been able to give some indication of our approach.

Domestic violence is not an issue to be dismissed as though it were a natural part of a women's personal life. It is not an issue that has been exaggerated by a few extremist campaigners. It is a blot on our society that affects victims physically and emotionally, directly and indirectly, in the short and long term. It wrecks lives. We want it to be recognised for the crime it is, and we are determined that it will be tackled effectively.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Ten o'clock.

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

The Minister was asked—

Flood Defences (Edgware)

1. Mr. Dismore: If he will make a statement on flood defences in the Edgware area. [33751]

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Elliot Morley): Although the Department has policy responsibility for flood defence, individual works are designed, constructed and maintained by the operating authorities for each area. The Environment Agency and local councils are jointly considering improvements to defences in the Edgware area.

Mr. Dismore: Is my hon. Friend aware that since the last extensive flooding many people feel that they are living on borrowed time and have sandbags piled high in their back gardens? The floods affected not just Edgware but Burnt Oak and Colindale, and caused substantial damage with consequent distress to my constituents. My constituents are concerned that recent changes to MAFF criteria for approval of schemes may adversely affect them. Before making any final decision on the expected report from the Environment Agency, will my hon. Friend agree to listen to further representations on that study?

Mr. Morley: My hon. Friend has pursued the threats to his constituents with diligence. The Environment Agency is considering a catchment plan for the Silk stream and its tributaries, which is probably the best way of approaching the problem. That proposal has not yet been put to MAFF, so we are not in a position to ascertain whether it meets the criteria. If it does not, stand-alone schemes may be considered to protect the interests of residents. We are always willing to receive representations.

BSE

2. Mr. Campbell-Savours: What recent developments there have been on the issue of BSE. [33752]

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Dr. John Cunningham): On 16 March, the Agriculture Council agreed by a convincing majority to lift the beef export ban for certified herds in Northern Ireland. That is excellent news for our beef industry, and is the first crucial step towards lifting the ban for the United Kingdom as a whole.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his success, but has he seen the most recent claims of Professor Lacey, who alleges that farmers are burying on their land BSE-infected fallen stock? I am having great difficulty understanding how that is possible, given that farmers are being paid between £540 and £680 for each animal that they notify as having BSE. What is actually happening?

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind remarks about our success in Brussels this week. The United Kingdom Renderers Association wishes to make it clear that no official representative of the association has ever met or discussed any issue with Professor Lacey. My hon. Friend is right that BSE is a notifiable disease, and the burials to which the allegations refer would therefore be an offence. He is also right to point out that, from April this year, if a BSE case is confirmed by post mortem, the farmer will receive £531 and, if it is not confirmed, and the animal has been destroyed, the farmer will receive £663. Given the position of UK farming, I find it difficult to believe that farmers would voluntarily forgo £500 million to £600 million.

Mrs. Spelman: Will the Minister confirm that the Workington site chosen for the new British cattle movement centre had the highest set-up costs of the three sites considered?

Dr. Cunningham: I can confirm that a cost-benefit analysis showed that Workington was the best site for the taxpayer and the industry.

Judy Mallaber: Will my right hon. Friend join me in welcoming the opening of the inquiry into BSE and Creutzfeldt-Jakob syndrome? I attended last week with a bereaved family from my constituency, who were very impressed.

Does my right hon. Friend share my concern about some of the initial evidence given to the inquiry, concerning a supposed culture of secrecy in the Ministry over the period involved, and about the suggestion that at least one vet was asked to change some of his findings? Will he ensure that Ministry officials are encouraged to attend the inquiry, and to give full information about the tragedies surrounding BSE and CJD?

Dr. Cunningham: It would not be appropriate for me to comment on what is happening in the inquiry, but I can say that the culture of secrecy in the Ministry ended on 3 May 1997. I have made it clear to all Ministry officials that they are free to give the inquiry whatever evidence they think appropriate, and that there is no question of any action being taken against them subsequently.

Mr. Charles Kennedy: In view of the significant breakthrough that has been achieved in Northern Ireland—which we all hope will be followed as swiftly as possible by similar progress in respect of England, Wales and Scotland—will the Minister comment on reports leaked from his Department earlier today concerning the selective cull scheme? Civil servants expressed concern about the effectiveness of traceability, and feared that such reports would send the wrong signal to our European Union counterparts. Can the Minister assure us that everything possible is being done in regard to the remaining 20 per cent. of animals, and that if further action is needed to maintain and build on the momentum at European level, no stone will be left unturned?

Dr. Cunningham: I can give the hon. Gentleman and the House a categorical assurance to that effect. The last Administration, however, were very slow: the selective cull did not begin until January 1997. Because of the delay, it is not surprising that not all the animals that we thought could be identified have been identified. However, because of the age of those animals and the operation of the over-30-months scheme, there have been no consequences to human health. If the animals were not killed, they would have been caught by the over-30-months scheme.

Mr. MacShane: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the borough of Rotherham is about 65 per cent. rural? It is one of the beef-eating and beef-producing centres of Yorkshire, so my constituents are delighted with the news that my right hon. Friend has brought back from Brussels. Does not that news, along with news of the reform of the common agricultural policy—the Commission is adopting a British agenda to force down food prices, which will benefit the British people—contrast with the isolationist, anti-European, xenophobic politics that caused such disaster in our farming communities when implemented by the Conservative Government?

Dr. Cunningham: As my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) have pointed out, we must press on as quickly as possible with the date-based export scheme for beef producers in the rest of the United Kingdom. I assure the House that we are doing that.

My hon. Friend is also right to remind us that the stupid isolationism of the last Administration, and their obsession with the European Union, left Britain not only without friends in the Agriculture Council but often derided, and greatly damaged the interests of all our farmers.

Mr. Thompson: Does the Minister take pleasure in the fact that the farmers of Northern Ireland greatly appreciate all the work that he and his colleagues have done over the months since he took power to persuade the European market to lift the ban, especially in Northern Ireland?

Some of the provisions that have been agreed mean that there will be extra flagged herds in Northern Ireland. The only long-term solution to that is the date-based system. Will the Minister continue his efforts to ensure that it starts to operate as soon as possible?

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his thanks and kind remarks. I recognise the significance of agriculture to Northern Ireland's economy and that beef producers in Northern Ireland have had a particularly difficult time. I know that they are delighted by this week's result in Brussels and the emphatic nature of the vote in the Council, which voted by qualified majority to accept the scheme. I accept, however, that it is imperative that we press ahead and try to achieve similar success for the dated-based export scheme because of the universal nature of that scheme.

Dr. Gibson: Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is still a great need to understand the scientific basis of this disease and its progression: the BSE prion and its mutational properties, its stability in blood and water, its cross-infectivity and the incubation time? Does he agree that scientific funding still needs to be found to understand the full properties of the prion?

Dr. Cunningham: I certainly agree that we need to know much more about BSE and new variant CJD, but I have recently authorised considerable additional expenditure for research of the sort to which my hon. Friend refers. That is an extensive research programme. We have probably the widest-ranging research programme into BSE and its consequences of any country. That programme will continue under this Administration.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: Following on from his earlier replies, will the Minister give us a candid assessment of the difficulties that he will face in achieving acceptance of a date-based export scheme within the European Union?

Dr. Cunningham: I can foresee some of the difficulties because some of our colleagues in the Council have been reluctant to cast their votes on the basis of the scientific and veterinary advice, opinions and evidence. It is important that we should insist that decisions are taken on the basis of science, not of political or economic advantage. I have already made my views abundantly clear in Brussels and in capitals throughout Europe, and I shall go on doing so.

Sea Defences

3. Mr. Tyrie: If he will make a statement about resources made available for sea defences. [33753]

Mr. Morley: Allocations for MAFF grants and credit approvals to operating authorities for capital flood and coastal defence works in 1998–99 are at the same levels as plans proposed last year by the previous Government. For future years, the funding level will depend on the outcome of the comprehensive spending review.

Mr. Tyrie: Is the Minister aware that the cost of emergency repairs at Selsey in my constituency is approaching £500,000 and that that money is coming from the Environment Agency budget that was originally earmarked for making more permanent repairs? Is that not a Catch-22 situation, because the more money is spent on emergency repairs, the less is available for making the sea defences permanent? Will the Minister assure my constituents that the Government will make available the resources necessary to bring an end to that absurd situation?

Mr. Morley: I can confirm that, because of the particular problems on the Sussex coast, extra resources have been available in relation to the grant-earning ceiling. That has been raised from the original allocation of £3 million to £3.9 million, which takes into account the points that the hon. Gentleman makes about the need for emergency repairs and the fact that the cost of permanent repairs has increased.

Beef Export Ban

4. Mr. Grogan: If he will make a statement on progress towards lifting the beef export ban. [33754]

Dr. John Cunningham: As I have just told the House, on Monday, we secured the first crucial step towards lifting the ban when the Agriculture Council approved the export certified herds scheme by a substantial majority.

Mr. Grogan: Does my right hon. Friend agree that there two lessons to be drawn from the successful meeting on Monday? First, as my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane)—whose constituency, even if it is 65 per cent. rural, is not as rural as Selby, which is is about 80 per cent. rural—said, if we are to have the ban lifted in England, Scotland and Wales, we need to maintain our constructive attitudes to Europe. Secondly, and more important, in the coming months we need to maintain the strongest possible public health measures.

Dr. Cunningham: My hon. Friend is right on both counts. It is because we have developed an open and constructive dialogue with all the institutions of the European Union—the Commission, the Council and the Parliament—that we have been able to make progress. The progress is due equally to the fact that we have taken stringent measures to safeguard the public and to ensure that our beef is safe to eat.

Mr. Jack: On behalf of Opposition Members, I welcome the announcement on the lifting of the Northern Ireland beef ban. It is a tribute to the foundation work put in place by previous Agriculture Ministers that this Minister has been able to achieve success in Brussels.

May I press the Minister a little further? A moment ago, he announced that he was confident that the date-based scheme offered the key that would unlock the door to the permanent lifting of the ban for the remainder of the United Kingdom. May I have his assurance that that remains the only barrier to lifting the ban? Will he be initiating a discussion at the next Agriculture Council to try to get on the record some form of indicative timetable for the lifting of the ban? Can he tell us when he expects the centre at Workington to be up and running?

Dr. Cunningham: The right hon. Gentleman asked a number of questions. First, I give the right hon. Gentleman at least nine out of 10 for brass neck. The previous Administration made no progress towards the lifting of the ban, which the right hon. Gentleman, the House, the country and, more particularly, our farmers know very well. The right hon. Gentleman is also out of touch with what is happening at the next Agriculture Council. The next Council will be a special Council which I have called to hold the opening discussion and debate on the Agenda 2000 proposals. There is no question of my tabling any indicative timetable at that time. The Council has the special and single purpose of discussing Agenda 2000. If the right hon. Gentleman spent more time and paid more attention to detail, we might get some sensible questions from him. Finally, we expect the centre at Workington to be operational later this year.

Farm Subsidies

5. Mr. Eric Clarke: When he last visited the north of England to discuss subsidies to farmers. [33755]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Jeff Rooker): I visited the region in February when I attended a meeting with the local National Farmers Union.

Mr. Clarke: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply. So much for the Conservatives being the party of the countryside. How can the Conservative party represent the countryside when it has no rural representatives—and no urban representatives, either, come to that—in Scotland or Wales? It is illogical. I assume that my hon. Friend will continue to meet farmers throughout the United Kingdom in order to discuss their problems.

Mr. Rooker: The answer to the question implied in my hon. Friend's comments is that we meet farmers regularly throughout the whole of the United Kingdom. Subsidies to farmers in Scotland—part of which my hon. Friend represents—were £480 million last year, which is an all-time high.

Mr. Jack: Farmers in the north of England will be interested in the recently published proposals for Agenda 2000—and particularly the way in which they affect the dairy sector. Can the Minister tell me whether, at the special Council which his right hon. Friend the Minister will be attending at the end of the month, he will be raising the fact that there is to be a 2 per cent. increase in milk quota, but that, as we have no mountain dairy producers or, at this stage, a newcomers' scheme, Britain will get no increase in milk quota, but will suffer a 15 per cent. reduction in the price of milk? Can the Minister give us an assurance that he will protect Britain's dairy farmers in those discussions?

Mr. Rooker: Yes, the issue will be raised.

Meat and Bonemeal (Disposal)

6. Ms Drown: What steps his Department is taking (a) to provide for the incineration of more meat and bonemeal and (b) to reduce the need for MBM storage. [33756]

Mr. Rooker: The Government are actively considering a number of major disposal options involving incineration for the meat and bonemeal derived from the over-30-months scheme. Our goal remains to find a disposal solution which takes full account of the need to protect human and environmental health, while keeping the cost to the taxpayer as low as possible.

Ms Drown: I thank the Minister for his reply. My constituents turned out in force last week at a council planning meeting and they were delighted that the council unanimously rejected a plan to store meat and bone meal at an inappropriate site in Wroughton in my constituency.

Will the Minister assure my constituents that MAFF, the intervention board and the Environment Agency will put no pressure on the applicant to appeal against the decision, so that my residents' wishes are respected?

Mr. Rooker: Yes; not only will MAFF not put any pressure on the applicant to make an appeal, but, if the applicant makes an appeal, we will put no pressure on the appellate authorities.

Farm Products

8. Mr. Hoyle: If he will launch a campaign to promote the safety and quality of British farm products. [33760]

Mr. Rooker: The safety and quality of British foods are second to none. My colleagues and I take every opportunity to publicise that fact, and to stimulate the effective marketing of our products. Promotional campaigns are really a matter for the trade, as they are far more expert at them than are the Government. However, we do what we can to support the various and many trade initiatives.

Mr. Hoyle: I am slightly disappointed by that answer—although it might help a bit if the Minister were to take on board the fact that the oldest agricultural show is staged in my constituency of Chorley. There are many agricultural shows across the country, at which MAFF has exhibitions. What better opportunity could there be to ensure and promote the safety and quality of our good British products? With a little imagination, which I know they have, the Government could raise the profile of safety and quality by promoting them at those shows. Such promotion is all the more important as some people, such as the French, continue to block British beef products but are not sorting out their own house.

Mr. Rooker: I understand and share my hon. Friend's concern. MAFF has travelling exhibitions which visit most of the shows and major exhibitions, such as the food fair that will soon be held in London. We have also sponsored a major British specialities exhibition at the food and drink expo—which I visited on Monday—at the national exhibition centre, in Birmingham. Although we shall continue our exhibitions, it is for the trade to push the matter. Ministers will give what support we can, and we shall visit as many shows as possible—especially targeting shows that Ministers have previously avoided.

Dr. Julian Lewis: How can the Minister justify the continuing ban on sales of beef on the bone in the light of the advice given by his own Ministry to the landlord of the Elm Tree pub in Swanwick that it is perfectly legal for him to cook beef on the bone if he strips it off the bone after it is cooked in the kitchen and before he serves it to his customers? How do the Minister and his colleagues, having introduced the legislation, feel to be the first Labour Ministers since Ramsay Macdonald—who earned the title from Winston Churchill, in 1931—to be boneless wonders?

Mr. Rooker: The hon. Gentleman and most of his colleagues have not quite got the message: the decisions that we took last December have enabled us to start to secure the beginning of the lifting of the beef ban. If what the hon. Gentleman said about the cooking of beef on the bone is accurate, it is contrary to the regulations. It is an offence to cook beef on the bone. As we have repeatedly made it clear, the danger will be in the juices—[HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"] Oh, yes; and we will not be the first Government knowingly to put infectivity in the food chain. Fairly soon, Conservative Members will get that message.

Mr. Hanson: Does my hon. Friend accept that farmers and consumers in my constituency realise that one of the best ways of promoting the safety of British food is by establishing the Food Standards Agency? Will he perhaps tell the House how he will promote that agency, so that producers and consumers understand the importance of promoting and improving our food?

Mr. Rooker: Yes. The consultation round on the White Paper "A Force for Change" concluded on Monday, and more than 400 representations were made. We expect to produce draft legislation for the House to consider by the early summer, to produce a Bill for the next parliamentary Session, and to have the agency up and running in the second half of next year.

Mr. Swinney: Once the date-based scheme is secure, will the Minister and the Government consider launching a campaign based on the safety and quality of United Kingdom beef, to ensure that our farmers can reclaim some of the export markets that have undoubtedly been jeopardised by the beef ban of the past two years?

Mr. Rooker: Yes. It would be useful to the House. Recently, Professor Philip James, having been asked about the safety of British beef, said in evidence to the Agriculture Committee:

"From my analysis of the BSE issue, I am embarrassed to tell you that . . . not just myself, but many members of our steering committee"—

the European Commission's scientific steering committee—

"believe that meat and meat products from Britain are safer than in most other European countries."

Mr. Soames: Will the hon. Gentleman join me in applauding the work of Food From Britain, which does an extraordinarily good job of promoting British food abroad? Does he agree that farmers need to do more to sell food directly to the consumer? What plans does he have to encourage farmers' markets, which are such a success in the United States of America and could do so much to bring farmers closer to consumers, to the benefit of both?

Mr. Rooker: Question Time is not the time to go into great detail, but when I was at the expo on Monday, I saw the excellent way in which Welsh beef farmers have been marketing pink beef and veal. They never thought of or needed to do such marketing before and they have the full support of my Department.

Farm Incomes

9. Mr. Garnier: When he will visit Harborough to discuss stock farmers' incomes. [33761]

Dr. John Cunningham: I have no plans to visit Harborough in the near future. However I know that the hon. and learned Gentleman met my hon. Friend the Minister of State on 2 March to discuss farmers' incomes and other issues.

Mr. Garnier: May I begin by thanking the Minister of State for receiving that delegation? It was an extremely helpful and useful meeting. May I draw to his attention the case of one my neighbours, who is a beef farmer? The price of his beef bulls, which were selling at about £720 before March 1996, is now £530. He has not been able to sell any breeding heifers at all, his cull cows have gone down in value from £750 to £300 and the value of his herd, which has increased in number from 257 to 290, has been devalued by £50,000. Will the Minister bear that in mind in his further discussions with the European Commission?

Dr. Cunningham: First, I thank the hon. and learned Gentleman for his kind remarks about my hon. Friend the Minister of State; we are always willing to receive delegations consisting of right hon. and hon. Members and their constituents. I shall certainly bear in mind his example which, sadly, is typical of problems in the beef industry. That is why we are determined to press ahead to seek acceptance for the date-based export scheme to bring further support to the beef sector, in addition to the agrimonetary compensation and the other financial support that we have recently announced.

Mr. Paice: After two Labour Budgets, the average 300-acre family farm, in Harborough and elsewhere, will be £1,300 worse off—and that in a week when the Minister has announced that farm incomes have almost halved. As the Budget did nothing to dampen the strength of sterling, farmers now face the prospect of a further green pound revaluation. Yet the strength of sterling has helped save the Minister some money in his Department's budget. Will he go further than his welcome U-turn on the subject of meat hygiene and cattle passport payments and seek additional ways, within his departmental budget, of relieving the massive burden on British agriculture? He could do that without asking for any further increase in public expenditure, which I know perfectly well he would find it difficult to obtain.

Dr. Cunningham: Both Budgets under the present Government have benefited people in rural as well as urban areas. Only the Conservative party cannot find a single word of praise for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer following his excellent Budget earlier this week. Like his right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), the hon. Gentleman never lets an opportunity pass without demanding more public expenditure. They say that I should find money from within my existing budget. What do they suggest I should cut to provide that extra money?

Agriculture (West Country)

11. Mr. David Heath: If he will visit the Royal Bath and West show this year to discuss the current state of agriculture in the west country. [33763]

Mr. Rooker: I am unable to attend the show. I am aware of the current state of agriculture in the west country following a visit by my noble Friend Lord Donoughue to north Devon and Exmoor early in January.

Mr. Heath: I am disappointed that the hon. Gentleman cannot visit the Royal Bath and West. He may recall that the previous Minister was warmly received there. He would be equally warmly received in my constituency. Given the figures released by his Department last week, showing a 35 per cent. decrease in dairy farm incomes and a 65 per cent. decrease in lowland beef and sheep farm incomes, does he accept that his right hon. Friend the Minister was incorrect to tell me last year that there was no crisis in west country agriculture?

Mr. Rooker: I respect the hon. Gentleman's argument and that of his farmers, who have suffered along with others. The extra help that we announced in December and confirmed in February—the cheques will be arriving this month—is going to the upland and less favoured areas. By common consent, that is where the need is greatest.

Mr. Tom King: Agriculture in the west country is in a serious predicament. The most obvious immediate effect of the Budget has been a rapid increase in the value of the pound. What is the Minister's estimate of the likely impact of that on farm incomes in the coming year?

Mr. Rooker: It is too early to say at the moment.

Beef Export Ban

12. Charlotte Atkins: What progress he is making on lifting the ban on British beef. [33764]

13. Mr. Love: What progress has been made with the lifting of the beef export ban. [33766]

Mr. Rooker: As my right hon. Friend the Minister said earlier this afternoon, we have made a major breakthrough with the European Council's agreement to the export certified herds scheme. We will be working hard to secure agreement to our proposals for a date-based export scheme, which would apply throughout the UK.

Charlotte Atkins: May I add my congratulations to those of other hon. Members on that? Is it true that only two European countries voted against the partial lifting of the ban? Does that represent progress on the issue with our European neighbours?

Mr. Rooker: My hon. Friend is right—only two voted against. In the Veterinary Committee a few weeks before, four voted against and one abstained. All the recent movement has been towards the position of the British Government.

Mr. Love: Does my hon. Friend agree that, without the strictest possible anti-BSE measures, including a ban on the sale of beef on the bone, there is no chance of the beef ban being lifted and that, unlike the Conservative party, he will act to protect public health?

Mr. Rooker: My hon. Friend is right. We cannot repeat often enough that without the most rigorous precautions on the safety of the beef food chain we shall not make any further progress and would not have made the progress that we have secured. Unlike the policy that we inherited, that approach seems to be working.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Does the Minister feel that the British Army's buying British beef and British lamb would give people on the continent confidence about accepting our meat? How is he progressing in the efforts that I know he is making with his colleagues in the Ministry of Defence to increase the proportion of British beef, lamb and other meat the Army uses?

Mr. Rooker: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point. The knowledge that the Ministry of Defence is not sourcing from the United Kingdom raises questions among our competitors and others. We have had discussions with our colleagues in the Ministry of Defence. We expect more British beef to be purchased in future. There is a long-term contract for frozen lamb from New Zealand, which was based on best value for money. I do not know when the contract finishes. We are discussing the issue.

Mr. Bercow: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that he has not conceded that computer traceability should be the precondition for the lifting of the beef export ban in other parts of the United Kingdom? Will he take this opportunity to confirm his view that there are manual records which are perfectly adequate for the satisfaction of that purpose?

Mr. Rooker: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's question. It must not get around that the lifting of the rest of the ban under the date-based scheme depends on a computerised system. The position was different in Northern Ireland for the certified herds scheme because the necessary records were available due to their computer system, which they have had for many years and which had nothing to do with BSE.

The date-based scheme will be secure for cattle born after 1 August 1996. We can guarantee that such cattle will not have been exposed to any contaminated feed. That scheme does not depend on the start of the computerised cattle traceability system, which is a wholly different operation. Although in future the traceability system will help, the lifting of the ban for the rest of the UK under a date-based scheme does not depend on it. If it did, we could not hope to make early progress because, by definition, the date of birth of cattle would be entered only from the summer, and we know that cattle born on 1 August 1996 will be 24 months old by then. We therefore expect early progress on the date-based scheme.

Mrs. Dunwoody: In view of what my hon. Friend has just said, will he say whether there is any hope for English producers who can demonstrate that their herds have been totally BSE-free for some considerable time? Usually because their cattle are pedigree animals, farmers are able to demonstrate that they have had no problems, but they are still unable to export. That seems unfair.

Mr. Rooker: My hon. Friend is right. It is not generally appreciated that the majority of cattle herds in this country have never had a case of BSE. Some 67 per cent. of the 120,000 herds have never had a case of BSE. For beef suckler herds, the situation is more extreme—84 per cent. have never had a case of BSE. That is why the majority of farmers are so angry; they have been affected by what happened to a minority of farmers. We can show that the majority of herds in this country have been BSE-free. Lifting the ban under a date-based scheme, or indeed a certified herd scheme, should be easier, but the myth gets around that every farmer has had loads of BSE cases. That is not true. The 171,000 cases of BSE have been identified on a minority of cattle farms.

Farm Incomes

14. Mr. Letwin: What estimate he has made of future trends in farm incomes in the United Kingdom. [33767]

Dr. John Cunningham: It is difficult to predict the trend in farm incomes because of the many factors involved. I am kept informed by officials on how specific market developments could impact on farm incomes.

Mr. Letwin: Is the Minister aware that, for many farmers in my constituency, that answer will seem very odd? They have performed their own calculations and believe that they will be out of business next year due to the present state of the pound and the Minister's steadfast refusal to apply for agrimonetary compensation at the level they require.

Dr. Cunningham: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely wrong on that final point. The announcement that I made in December, and confirmed earlier this year, was based on agrimonetary compensation.

Mr. Letwin: It was a small amount.

Dr. Cunningham: The hon. Gentleman clearly does not understand. He says that it was a small amount, but it was virtually all that was available in agrimonetary compensation for the beef sector at that point.

Mr. Bradshaw: Does my right hon. Friend agree that farming incomes are particularly vulnerable to currency fluctuations? Does he therefore welcome the support of the National Farmers Union for the single European currency? Does he agree that it is absolutely ludicrous for the Conservative party to claim to be the friend of the farmer when it is still viscerally opposed to the single European currency?

Dr. Cunningham: My hon. Friend puts it very succinctly, and I agree with him.

Common Agricultural Policy

15. Mr. Wilkinson: If he discussed the reform of the common agricultural policy with the Minister of Agriculture of Chile during his recent visit to the United Kingdom. [33768]

Dr. John Cunningham: My noble Friend Lord Donoughue met the Chilean Minister of Agriculture on Thursday 5 March. Reform of the common agricultural policy was one of the items that they discussed.

Mr. Wilkinson: I am not surprised at that answer inasmuch as it must seem extraordinarily perverse that the United Kingdom allows itself to be part of a European Union agricultural policy that deliberately excludes some of the very best and cheapest agricultural produce in the world, such as that from Chile, Argentina, Uruguay and Paraguay. As the European Union's agricultural policy is up for review, could not only the consequences of enlargement but the paramount importance of satisfying the need for British consumers to get the best possible and most economic deal be taken into account?

Dr. Cunningham: I am delighted to agree with the hon. Gentleman; he is absolutely right. We should lose no opportunity to press for reform of the common agricultural policy, because of this country's support for successful enlargement of the Union, because of the impending next round of the World Trade Organisation talks on liberalisation and because, as the hon. Gentleman says, we want to give our consumers the best value for money and the best choice in the food that they buy.

Fishing Industry (Coastal Management Schemes)

16. Mr. Quinn: What consultations he has had recently with leaders of the fishing industry with regard to coastal management schemes. [33769]

Mr. Morley: I plan to meet leaders of the fishing industry shortly to discuss their recent paper on zonal and coastal state management.

Mr. Quinn: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer and suggest that it would be useful if he could visit fishing communities in Scarborough and Whitby and along the rest of the North Yorkshire coast to receive from them in person the thanks that they have expressed to me for the good start that the Government have made with fishing policy.

Mr. Morley: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's comments. I am always more than willing to meet people from the fishing industry in fishing ports to talk about issues of concern. It is true that we have brought stability to an industry that has lacked it for many years, by getting to grips with the issue of multi-annual guidance programmes III and IV after years of delay.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

The Attorney-General was asked—

International Bribery

24. Mr. Bayley: What advice he has given the Government on the implementation of the EU and OECD conventions on international bribery. [33782]

The Attorney-General (Mr. John Morris): Officials in the departments for which I am responsible are involved in providing assistance in such matters, but my hon. Friend will know that, by convention, advice given by the Law Officers, and even the fact of its existence, is not disclosed outside Government.

Mr. Bayley: What action are the Government taking during the United Kingdom's presidency of the EU to combat corruption in the public and private sectors?

The Attorney-General: I know of my hon. Friend's strong interest in this matter. Indeed, he introduced a Bill on the subject in February. The Government have been a strong supporter of measures to penalise corruption. As president, the United Kingdom is taking forward a Luxembourg presidency initiative on corruption in the private sector, which will build on and complement existing EU legislation against corruption of officials. Furthermore, a detailed report being produced by the presidency and the Commission evaluates existing anti-corruption measures in both the first and third pillars.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman tell us more about what the Government are trying to do to ensure that our EU partners are not using bribery or other corrupt practices to obtain contracts in other parts of the world? During my visits to other countries, I have heard that Britain often loses out because companies, rightly, are not willing to engage in bribery and corruption with officials in countries such as the former Soviet Union, whereas some other notable large countries in the EU appear only too pleased to do so, to win contracts from Britain.

The Attorney-General: I am sure that my right hon. Friends who will be concerned with such matters in any discussions will seek to do what they can within the European Union to ensure that there is a level playing field. In our domestic law, we can deal only with offences committed within the jurisdiction.

Mr. Skinner: As we are told that Cyprus is trying to join the European Union and will thus be affected to some extent by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and all the other areas of influence, will my right hon. and learned Friend tell me whether, if discussions take place, the Government will tell the people of Cyprus that we shall bargain to ensure that Asil Nadir is brought back to this country as part of any deal so that he can tell us precisely when he handed the money over to the Tory party and what steps will be taken to give it back to the shareholders who were robbed of it in the first place?

The Attorney-General: I know of my hon. Friend's repeated concern and interest in this matter, which I suspect will not arise during the discussions. I shall take it up with my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Crown Prosecution Service

25. Sir Nicholas Lyell: When he now expects to receive the report of the committee reviewing the work and organisation of the Crown Prosecution Service. [33784]

The Attorney-General: Sir Iain Glidewell has informed me that he will not now be able to finalise his report this month, as he had hoped. Both he and I understand how important it is to the staff of the CPS that it should be completed as quickly as possible. I am satisfied that the review team is proceeding as expeditiously as it can, consistent with thoroughness.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: Pending receipt of the report, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman cast his mind back to when he was in opposition and recall how critical he was of the CPS in relation to discontinuances? Has he noticed his own most recent figures, which show that, during the months he has had responsibility, they seem to have gone up somewhat? What is more, those discontinued before the first hearing seem to have dropped. Can he given an explanation and assure the House that the CPS has all the backing it needs?

The Attorney-General: I can assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the CPS has the backing it needs. This matter comes under the terms of reference of the Glidewell report, and the House would be right to await the report before forming a view. Evidence is required, but the right hon. and learned Gentleman is quite right to draw attention to recent figures.

Mr. Barnes: In North-East Derbyshire, we cannot get the CPS to prosecute motorcyclists, or bodies organising them, who misuse designated bridleways and bridlepaths. Might the review provide some opportunity to allow the CPS to do its work, or might we need a change in the law?

The Attorney-General: I shall draw that matter to the attention of the Director, although these are substantially matters for the police in the first instance.

26. Mr. Clifton-Brown: If he will make a statement on the review of the Crown Prosecution Service. [33785]

The Attorney-General: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave a few moments ago to the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Sir N. Lyell).

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Is the Attorney-General aware that the CPS's computer system, SCOPE, had to be abandoned, at a huge loss of public money, because it was unable to cope with the new teamworking practices introduced by the CPS? This means that the CPS is now without any computer system that allows its branches to communicate with each other, let alone with every police force in England and Wales. What will the Attorney-General do to ensure this unsatisfactory situation is resolved?

The Attorney-General: I am aware of the interest and the criticism of the hon. Gentleman, who raised this matter in a Select Committee. I am grateful to him for giving notice of his question. SCOPE is a basic tracking and management system and, where installed, performs those functions adequately. It has been overtaken as the CPS changed and greater demands were made of the system. The CPS is pursuing methods to meet those needs, including consideration of the private finance initiative. I attach importance to compatibility with the remainder of the criminal justice system and I know that the Glidewell review is considering the issue.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: In light of press reports on the Glidewell review, can my right hon. and learned Friend tell the House whether it is proposed to restructure the CPS to 30 or 42 separate areas?

The Attorney-General: I am glad my hon. Friend has raised this matter, because there has been a misconception about it during the past few weeks. We took office with a commitment to restructure the CPS to 42 areas so as to align CPS areas with police force areas. That was the object of the exercise and it remains the policy. Sir Iain Glidewell's terms of reference are clear and require that his recommendations are on the basis of the service being organised into 42 areas.

Mr. Soames: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman join me in paying tribute to the work of the Crown Prosecution Service in West Sussex, in particular the division run from Horsham, which looks after the magistrates court in Haywards Heath? Does he agree that it does a remarkably good job, despite the fact that it is short staffed and under great pressure? The most important thing that the CPS needs to carry out its task to the best of its ability is a little more money.

The Attorney-General: I understand why the hon. Gentleman presses for more public expenditure, but he knows the remit under which we have decided to operate. I am glad that he has paid tribute to his local staff—a large number of very hard-working and hard-pressed men and women work in the CPS. The Glidewell report is considering the means to ensure that the resources that are available are used to the best advantage and that lawyers get on with prosecuting and managers get on with managing, so that there is not the current undue mix.

Mr. Bermingham: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that the Glidewell report will thoroughly review the working relationships between the police and the Crown Prosecution Service?

The Attorney-General: Yes. My hon. Friend raises an important issue. Concern that the relationship was not as smooth as it could be was a big factor in our decision to set up the review and to align police and CPS areas. It is also a specific topic in the review's terms of reference. The House will be aware that a very experienced former chief constable and inspector of constabularies, Sir Geoffrey Dear, is one of the team of three, which includes, of course, Sir Iain as chairman.

Fraud Trials

27. Mr. Lock: What representations he has received on the use of juries in fraud trials. [33786]

The Attorney-General: Last month, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary launched a consultation exercise seeking views on whether an alternative method of trial should be available in serious and complex fraud cases and on the viability of various options for change. I have not received any representations following the launch of the consultation exercise.

Mr. Lock: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for that answer. Does he share my surprise that those who present fraud trials in an extended and lucrative way have taken no steps to preserve the current system? Does he also agree that Britain's reputation as a place for international financial business depends on effective and thorough mechanisms to combat fraud? What further steps do the Government propose to take to combat financial fraud?

The Attorney-General: In his consultation exercise, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is examining the effectiveness of current trial management procedures. Moreover, the Government intend to widen the gateways to allow for the flow of information between all relevant agencies in the fight against fraud. We are also considering a system of civil fines for behaviour that, although not criminal, nevertheless tarnishes the market's reputation. The Government also recognise that an effective system of regulation is necessary to complement the criminal justice system, so a new single financial regulator, the Financial Services Authority, has been set up to help secure the United Kingdom's place as a fair, safe and clean place in which to do financial services business.

Mr. Burnett: Does the Attorney-General agree that juries should set and decide on standards for honesty in fraud as well as other trials?

The Attorney-General: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has set out various options. The Government recognise that there are concerns that the current system for handling some major, complex fraud trials is not working satisfactorily and that there may be a case for considering some change to the system, but we have not yet reached a conclusion on whether the ending of jury trials in serious fraud cases is desirable in principle. Moreover, we have not yet formed an opinion on any particular option for change and will not do so until the consultation procedure is complete.

Mr. Blunt: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware of any fundamental objection to a system of specialist jurors with financial qualifications, and who have time available to sit, as the solution to that problem?

The Attorney-General: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will want to read the Home Secretary's White Paper and look at the options there canvassed. As I said in my first answer, I have not received any representations. That is one of the suggestions that could be canvassed; I invite the hon. Gentleman to make his representations to the Home Secretary.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

The Minister was asked—

Red Meat

17. Mr. Spring: If he will make a statement on the impact on the livestock industry of the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food and Nutrition Policy's recommendations on red meat consumption. [33771]

Mr. Rooker: We have no way of measuring the exact impact on the livestock industry of recommendations made by the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food and Nutrition Policy in its recent report on the relationship between diet and cancer. For the avoidance of doubt, I remind the House that all the work on that report was completed before the Government came to power.

Mr. Spring: Does the hon. Gentleman realise how demoralising all this is for beef farmers and, indeed, how confusing it is for consumers? I do not want to make any party-political point, but does he accept that constant change in what is supposedly safe and what we can or cannot eat is very undermining and reduces significantly the credibility of Government spokesmen?

Mr. Rooker: The hon. Gentleman's remarks are based on many of the myths and press reports surrounding the publication of the report. The fact of the matter is that COMA's recommendations about reducing the consumption of red and processed meat apply only to above average consumers, especially those who consume very high quantities of red and processed meat. The recommendations do not apply to the vast generality of the British public who eat red meat.

Schools Funding

3.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): With permission, Madam Speaker, I wish to make a statement. Tuesday's Budget has rightly been well received. It confirmed new Labour's reputation for economic competence. It was a Budget for enterprise, a Budget for work and a Budget for families and for education.

The Chancellor pledged an extra £250 million for schools and skills in the coming financial year. Let me remind the House that that increase is part of the £2.5 billion boost for education and skills that we have already earmarked in the 10 months since we were elected last May. We inherited a situation in which, between 1993 and 1996, the Conservative party had cut £110 in real terms from every secondary pupil in the country and £44 from every primary pupil. Already, we have made a substantial start to repair the damage of those Tory years of neglect, by providing an extra £110 for every pupil in the coming financial year. We have increased the standards fund to more than £500 million in 1998–99, which includes an extra £59 million to improve literacy standards.

Today, I want to detail the big difference that this week's Budget will make, in increasing the means available to improve our schools and their pupils, by outlining four further major steps that we intend to take. First, I can make this pledge. We will bring to an end the scandal whereby children in 600 of our schools, most of them primary, still have to go outside to use the toilet. Tens of thousands of children have to go outside to use facilities that often date back to the Victorian age. That is simply unacceptable in the last years of the 20th century. We are inviting the authorities affected to apply for a share of the extra £35 million that we are earmarking, so that they can provide the decent facilities that every modern school should have. By next year, we shall have ended the scandal of outside toilets for ever. That will take our schools from the Victorian age into the age of the new millennium.

Secondly, I am concerned at the number of schools that have inefficient boilers and heating systems, which often break down. They waste energy and leave thousands of children spending the winter days in cold and draughty classrooms. We shall provide an extra £15 million to allow up to 500 schools to replace or improve their inefficient heating systems.

That will make classrooms more comfortable and learning-friendly places, save a great deal of money and put a stop to the waste of energy and damage to the environment, with a reduction in carbon dioxide emissions. As many as 100,000 children will have, at long last, the working conditions that they should be able to take for granted in a civilised society.

Thirdly, we have already announced the first £22 million to provide the extra teachers to ensure that we make an immediate start on our class size pledge, so that by 2001 every five, six and seven-year-old will be in a class of 30 or fewer. That first tranche will mean that 100,000 infants will benefit from this September.

When we announced that funding, redirected from the phasing out of the assisted places scheme, we made it clear that there would be extra money to build extra classrooms where they were needed. Today, I can announce that an extra £40 million from the Budget will be targeted specifically on providing those extra facilities in 1998–99. That will help us to deliver our core pledge on class sizes, which will help us to meet our demanding literacy and numeracy targets.

Those three capital spending measures will be in addition to the £250 million from the new deal for schools to be allocated in 1998–99 and to the £800 million that local education authorities and schools are spending in the normal way on repairs and maintenance this year.

There is a fourth piece of good news on schools from the Budget. I can further confirm that we shall expand rapidly our education action zones programme. We shall fund a fivefold increase to establish 25 zones by January 1999. We have already had considerable interest from imaginative partnerships between schools, LEAs and business at local level.

The zones offer extra flexibility to help schools in challenging circumstances to meet demanding targets and to make significant improvements in standards and expectations. By making a substantial expansion in the coming year, I am confident that we shall be able to extend the programme yet further in this Parliament.

This is a coherent programme that will help the process of transforming schools for the future. It means no more children having to go outside to use the toilet; improvements in the heating of schools; substantial further progress towards meeting our class size pledge; and a big boost to our flagship programme of education action zones.

In the years ahead, we shall meet our manifesto commitment to increase the proportion of national income spent on education. We are making a substantial start in the year ahead. By doing so, we are transforming the life chances of millions of children. We are modernising the fabric of our schools and making real progress in raising standards for all our children.

This is a new Labour Budget; a Budget for a modern Britain in a new century; a Budget to turn ambition into achievement.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood): It would be churlish not to welcome extra money to be spent on education, and I am pleased to welcome the Chancellor's announcement of extra spending on schools—

Mr. Blunkett: But.

Mr. Dorrell: There is indeed a but. As the Chancellor went to considerable trouble on Tuesday to obscure precisely how much extra he intended should be spent on schools, can the Secretary of State confirm that the total of new money to be spent on schools in England that he has announced today is a £90 million capital programme, to be spent on the no doubt desirable objectives—certainly, they are desirable—of ending outside lavatories, modernising heating and building extra classrooms to accommodate the expansion required by the Government's class size pledge? Can the Secretary of State confirm that, when the Chancellor announced on Tuesday £250 million for education, he was misleading the House and that the Secretary of State has set out this afternoon the reality—

Madam Speaker: Order. Did I hear the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) accuse another right hon. Gentleman of misleading the House? I am sure that he will apologise.

Mr. Dorrell: Inadvertently misleading the House, Madam Speaker. Has not the Secretary of State made clear this afternoon that the quantum of the Government's commitment, following the Budget, is £90 million in new money for schools? That is my first question.

Secondly, will the Secretary of State clarify exactly the status of the new deal for schools? He said in his statement that the capital plans are in addition to the £250 million from the new deal for schools allocated for 1998–99. However, the Red Book from last year's July Budget says that, in 1998–99, the new deal for schools should be £300 million. Will the Secretary of State confirm whether the new deal for schools in 1998–99 is £300 million, as announced last July, or £250 million, as set out in his statement this afternoon?

Thirdly, will the Secretary of State confirm to the House that he is now acknowledging that the Government were always wrong in saying that they could meet the cost of their class size pledge from the savings arising from the abolition of the assisted places scheme? Nobody except Ministers believed that that was possible. The Secretary of State announced this afternoon that the cost of meeting the class size pledge next year will be £22 million—as the Minister for School Standards announced to the Standing Committee on the School Standards and Framework Bill earlier this year. I should be grateful if the Secretary of State confirmed that the Government now recognise that they cannot meet their class size pledge using the savings from the assisted places scheme.

Fourthly, I should like to ask the Secretary of State about education action zones. The Conservatives have, broadly speaking, welcomed those ideas as they have been discussed in Committee. Will the Secretary of State confirm that the purpose is to provide opportunities for private sector firms to offer an alternative to local education authority-managed schools? That is certainly what the Secretary of State's adviser, Professor Barber, announced to the north of England education conference earlier this year—indeed, he said that it made it possible for Procter and Gamble to run schools. Is that the Secretary of State's policy, or was it a bit of private enterprise on the part of Professor Barber? I shall be interested to hear the Secretary of State's response.

Finally, will the Secretary of State confirm that the £90 million in new money that he has set out to the House this afternoon represents roughly half a per cent. of school spending? Will he confirm that it makes no difference at all to the pressures being experienced in schools up and down the country? Reports are coming in, day by day, from Wiltshire, Oxfordshire, Somerset, Suffolk and many other counties about schools that are facing severe resource constraints.

Is it not the case that the Government will enter their second year in office with many schools facing cuts and many teachers worried about their jobs? Is not the substance of what the Secretary of State hails as a new Labour Budget that the Government's priorities are not, as the Prime Minister likes to claim, education, education, education but in fact presentation, presentation, presentation?

Mr. Blunkett: The right hon. Gentleman has confirmed more vividly than I could the importance of the extra £835 million allocation to our schools as a result of the July announcement. He confirmed how crucial it is that education in England will receive £250 million more in the coming year through the new deal and that we shall manage to provide 1,500 more teachers from this September in order to fulfil our class size pledge. Those measures are in addition to the miserable £182 million that the previous Government allocated for education in the coming year.

I shall certainly answer the right hon. Gentleman's questions. There is £250 million for education in skills, which is what I said in my statement to the House this afternoon. A proportion of that goes to England, Scotland and Wales, which answers the right hon. Gentleman's second question. Wales, Scotland and Ireland get a proportion of the £300 million for the new deal. I am making a statement, as is the usual convention in the House, about England, because that is where I have responsibility for education.

Let me spell it out. There will be £250 million for the new deal for the coming year, and an extra £250 million across the UK for education in skills in the coming year, £90 million of which I have announced today.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about the class size pledge. We made it clear that the phasing out of the assisted places scheme would slow down implementation of the class size pledge. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has helpfully allocated an extra £40 million in the coming year to accelerate the implementation of the class size pledge—for preparing, planning and ensuring that the design of extra facilities, the expansion of a classroom or the alteration of a building can take place in the months ahead, so that we can do even better in 1999 than we originally envisaged.

I was not sure whether the right hon. Gentleman was welcoming or criticising the measure. Is he in favour of the class size pledge or against it? Does he want smaller classes, or is he against them? Is it just sheer disappointment that has provoked him this afternoon to make what sounded like a griping, critical statement about £40 million more for schools throughout the country? If one was generous, that could be described only as extremely churlish, and the right hon. Gentleman was very churlish.

In reply to the right hon. Gentleman's fourth question, schools manage schools and will continue to do so, LEAs will continue to give their support and others will give their enterprise and initiative where it is appropriate as part of a partnership. I hope that Conservatives will welcome, encourage and support the development of education action zones, which will bring new initiatives in areas that need them most.

There will not be an authority from inner London, Essex or Derbyshire, or from the south-west of England, which will not today rejoice that they will at last be able to do what they have yearned to do for years, and what parents and children have wanted, which is, after 18 years of Conservative government, to eliminate the 600 remaining outside toilets in Britain's schools, so that we can have a civilised nation in the build-up to a new century—the end of the 19th century as we move to the 21st century.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I roundly welcome my right hon. Friend's statement. It may be too early to put out the flags for the schools with outside toilets, but if he would like to come to my constituency and cut the ribbons when they have all gone inside, I am sure that the heads will be only too delighted to welcome him.

Mr. Blunkett: I should be delighted to come to Stroud to celebrate, and even to use the new facilities; to declare new Britain, new loos.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): We are disappointed that the Secretary of State's statement was widely leaked to the media well before we heard it today. After the debacle of the Secretary of State for Health yesterday, we were assured that that would never occur again. Yet when we did the media rounds at lunchtime today, every media outlet had the full statement.

Mr. Tony McNulty (Harrow, East): Flush out the leakers.

Mr. Willis: We must flush out the leakers. That is a most appropriate comment.

Liberal Democrats welcome any new spending on education and, although £90 million is not as much as we would have liked, it is still extremely welcome. The £35 million to eliminate outside toilets is particularly welcome because, in this day and age, outside toilets raise the important issue of child safety. However, we are surprised at the speed at which the right hon. Gentleman has been able to move, because on 3 March my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) was told that the Secretary of State did not know how many schools had outside toilets. We also welcome the £15 million to be spent on heating. It is important that our children and our teachers have quality facilities in which to work. However, we are disappointed that, again, there is a bidding system for both those sums. It does not seem appropriate that we have a new, trusting arrangement with local education authorities only to bypass them and go into the schools the first time that money is available.

We welcome the extension of education action zones—we have always supported that proposal—but ask the Secretary of State to ensure that there are a number of rural action zones, and that the preponderance of education action zones is not concentrated on the inner cities.

We are hugely disappointed that the whole area of lifelong learning is neglected and that there are no additional resources to meet the pledge that the Secretary of State made in "The Learning Age", or the pledges that have been made in response to the Dearing and Kennedy reports. Sixty per cent. of further education colleges face deficits, and more will be technically insolvent this year. When will this Cinderella sector be given the resources that it needs, to tackle the bridgehead between schools and universities?

Mr. Blunkett: I look forward to the day when the Liberal Democrats whole-heartedly welcome anything, because lifting the morale and motivation of the teaching profession is all about not griping and being cynical about every move that is made. I reassure the House that the media did not have my statement at lunchtime; I was still revising it. Secondly, I took the trouble of not going on the "Today" programme, which is unheard of in terms of Government presentations—I say to the Leader of the House that I am only joking.

Let me deal with the last point head on. This is not a statement about lifelong learning. There are resources for skills and lifelong learning, which will be announced separately. We have already allocated £100 million to further education and £165 million to higher education over and above what was allocated by the previous Government. It is simply not true that resources are not available to implement the proposals in "The Learning Age". The comprehensive spending review will deal with that.

There will have to be a bidding process to ensure that we target the money at schools that are in greatest need: first, to replace outside toilets—and that means all outside toilets, wherever they are—and, secondly, to replace the heating systems that are in most need of immediate action. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that education action zones will be available in rural areas, and we look forward very much to evaluating the bids from counties that believe that this initiative will help them to raise standards.

Madam Speaker: After the intervention made by the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), perhaps we can have questions.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement. Is not it a fact that, for 18 years, we had a Government who did nothing to tackle the problem of our decaying schools and often refused to recognise that poor school facilities, such as toilets, boilers and so on, have an effect on learning in schools? We now have a Government who are prepared to put money into those areas, and who will, over the next five years, show that we mean business as far as education, education, education is concerned.

Mr. Blunkett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The means to ensure a transformation in the life chances of youngsters who have had to put up with intolerable conditions in the past will bring great comfort to people in Burnley.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham): Will the right hon. Gentleman please tell me how many London boroughs surrounding the borough of Bromley will become education action zones; and when does he expect their standard of education to improve to the standard in Bromley? Bromley parents will then be able to use the places in their schools that are currently taken up by the 25 per cent. of out-of-borough pupils. Those pupils are very welcome, because they get a decent standard of education, but it should be provided in their own Labour-controlled borough.

Mr. Blunkett: On the first question, the bids for education action zones are completed and will be with the Department tomorrow. When we are able to evaluate them, we shall announce where the action zones will be placed.

On the second question, the hon. Lady has raised this issue before. I give her the same reply that I gave before. It is a scandal that children cannot get into Bromley schools because of the selective system, even though they may live just round the corner. It may be good for people in other areas to travel to take up places in Bromley schools, but it is no joke for those who have to travel miles from Bromley because they are pushed out by children coming in from elsewhere.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley): I am flushed with pleasure at my right hon. Friend's statement. Before the election, Conservative Members did not think that class sizes mattered, but now they do. Is it not churlish of them not to welcome the statement whole-heartedly, given that children often lose days of education because of broken boilers? Is it not better that we invest in their classrooms rather than have them huddle together for warmth?

Mr. Blunkett: Yes, it certainly is. I welcome what my hon. Friend says, and echo what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health said yesterday: the money for the health service will ensure that we are prepared, even if we are hit by the meteorite. I am preparing children to be able to get somewhere quickly should they learn that the meteorite is coming.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): With the cry, "New Labour, new loos", the Secretary of State confirmed our fear that the future of education will go down the drain under the Government. Is it not bound to be noticed that the most welcome improvements of facilities at the 600 schools that he mentioned will cost £35 million, which amounts to £60,000 per school? Why is the Secretary of State inviting local education authorities to spend the money, and not enabling schools directly to get their hands on it so that it could be spent more efficiently and more carefully?

Mr. Blunkett: That takes the biscuit. We shall be replacing toilets, putting boilers into schools and replacing heating systems through the most administratively efficient mechanism possible. When LEAs are responsible for capital investment for schools under their auspices, it is sensible that they carry out improvements. We shall not advertise across the country for schools to declare themselves; we must move swiftly. We want bids to be in by 30 April, so that we can ensure that the scandal of children going across the yard and around the corner in the wet to spend a penny does not continue into the winter months.

Ms Margaret Hodge (Barking): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his statement. Does he not agree that the Opposition education spokesperson should not deliberately muddle, if not inadvertently mislead, the House by pretending that the money is not new? Would not it be better if the Opposition apologised for spending 18 years failing to address the basic issue of installing inside lavatories in our schools? Many good Labour-controlled local education authorities have spent the past 18 years trying to provide inside toilets, and they would welcome being given some of the resources to improve their heating systems. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that they will not be disadvantaged when he determines how the money will be spread?

Mr. Blunkett: We shall distribute the money on the basis of need. As with the new deal for schools, we shall ensure that it is applied to assist in overcoming the legacy that we have inherited, and to assist us with the standards fund. I welcome my hon. Friend's opening words: we are at the end of an era, and at the beginning of a new one. I had hoped that the Opposition would welcome that. With regard to the remarks of the shadow Secretary of State, we are working hard to get the numeracy schools off the ground as fast as we can.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): What is the increase in education funding for Lincolnshire in the first year of Labour government compared with those in the last two years of Conservative government? If, as I suspect, the difference is modest, would it not have been more honest if my Labour opponent at the general election, instead of saying, "Education, education, education" had said, "Same old problems, same old problems, same old problems; same old increase as the Tories every year, same old increase as the Tories every year, same old increase as the Tories every year"?

Mr. Blunkett: I do not think that schools in Lincolnshire that have £1,000 extra to spend on books before 31 March would say, "Same old expenditure, same old Government." When they are given their allocation from the new deal for schools programme next year, they will not say that it is the same old story. As I announced in my statement, schools will receive, on average, £110 more for each pupil next year than they would have received under the Tories.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the parents of the kids in those 600 schools, many of which are in rural and semi-rural areas, will not care whether it is old or new money? They will not get terribly excited about whether it is in the Red Book, the Blue Book or the Green Book. They will know that this is real money. Those 600 schools need sorting out: the Tories had 18 years in which to do it. This work will be done before the end of the century, and those parents and kids will be better off as a result of the action announced today.

Mr. Blunkett: If every hon. Member showed such spirit, we would make enormous progress in giving the children of this country the life chances that they deserve.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): May I draw to the Secretary of State's attention the case of Fairfield Road primary school in Market Harborough? It has already put in a bid under the new deal for schools. Will the boiler money that he has just announced be in addition? The school has three separate boilers and three different fuel systems, and it would obviously be sensible to have one boiler system and one fuel system.

Mr. Blunkett: I am aware that the hon. and learned Gentleman has written about that matter. The money that I have announced will be additional to the bids under the new deal for schools.

Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): I greatly welcome the Secretary of State's statement. Does he agree that 20 years of under-investment in education, of children peeing in disgusting lavatories, and of freezing classrooms often in huts that contain asbestos has given the message that education does not matter, which it did not under the previous Government? Will he consider following up this excellent scheme with a programme to get rid of the use of huts, many of which leak and contain asbestos? Will he also ensure that education action zone proposals can be made in future? This year, Slough is becoming a unitary authority and a local education authority for the first time. That is not an appropriate time to make a sensible proposal for the creation of an education action zone. Will he give me an assurance that the programme will be available to such authorities in the future?

Mr. Blunkett: Health and safety is one of our key priorities under the new deal. The replacement of asbestos and the removal of what are no longer temporary classrooms, because many of them are more than 40 years old, will be part of that programme. Moreover, I can give my hon. Friend the assurance that she seeks. Subject to the outcome of the comprehensive review, I hope to expand the education action zone programme during this Parliament.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): No doubt the right hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) will have explained to the Secretary of State that Oxfordshire this year faces a £3.5 million deficit on its education budget, which is leading to reductions in school budgets. Is the Secretary of State aware of the feeling in shire counties such as Oxfordshire that they are losing out on the standard spending assessment system, and that they will not benefit from initiatives such as the one that has been announced this afternoon, however welcome they may be? I do not expect the Secretary of State to answer now, but it would be helpful if he would write and explain how much money he thinks Oxfordshire will receive under this initiative, because I suspect that it will be very little.

Mr. Blunkett: I shall be happy to write to the hon. Gentleman and let him know how many outside toilets in Oxfordshire schools will be replaced and how much will be spent on the replacement of boilers and heating systems. I can assure him that the allocation of new deal resources will be made fairly and openly and will be based on need, as is the allocation from the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. I am sure that he will agree that it will be done in precisely the same way as his right hon. and hon. Friends allocated resources before the general election.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): The statement is exceptionally welcome for Derbyshire, which is in great difficulty in all the respects described by my right hon. Friend. It has had to exceed its capping level in order to maintain its expenditure, and its primary schools probably have larger classes than those in any other shire county. Schemes to tackle such problems are very welcome. If it all works in Derbyshire, it will work throughout the country.

Mr. Blunkett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what he has said, and for his commitment and enthusiasm. It is worth recalling that we have also allocated £1.1 million to Derbyshire county for the investment that will be needed in September to fulfil the pledge on class sizes, and a further £1 million for the city of Derby. We have made some progress, although much more remains to be done to overcome the legacy of 18 years from which Derbyshire is suffering.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North): Parents and teachers in Bury will welcome the statement, as they welcomed the education statement in last year's Budget and the statement on the standards fund in February this year.

Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the worst legacies of the past 18 years is the continued existence of enormous discrepancies between the per capita funding of children in primary and secondary schools across the country? My schools in Bury are in one of the small group of authorities with chronically low per capita funding. Consequently, they struggle to obtain basic materials, and, even with the help over class sizes, they will continue to struggle next year.

The solution can lie only in the reform of the current SSA system. Has my right hon. Friend any plans to start reforming it, so that education investment can be distributed more equitably?

Mr. Blunkett: My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister and my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Housing are aware of the considerable pressure for rapid change exerted by, among others, those who previously supported the SSA system. I think we all know that there is improvement to be made, and the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions is working on that.

Bury makes excellent provision. It has an excellent local education authority with excellent schools, and it will have come as close as any authority in Britain to eliminating classes of 30 or more by September this year.

Mr. Hugh Bayley (City of York): Following today's performance, the next statement that we hear from Opposition spokesmen about education will have to feature this question to my right hon. Friend: "Apart from cutting school class sizes, getting rid of outside toilets, providing proper heating systems and improving education standards, what have a Labour Government ever done for the education of our children?"

Let me make a more serious point. Does my right hon. Friend agree that, to make capital go as far as possible, the Government need to consider private-public partnerships? Might it not be a good idea for the Department to scour the executive agencies under its umbrella for talented people with experience of such partnerships, and to try to establish a unit that would put their skills to use?

Mr. Blunkett: I cannot list all the items—including books and equipment—that we have provided in our first 10 months of government, and all the things that we have managed to do so far. Over the months ahead, however, I shall do my best to ensure that the outside world hears about them.

I am mindful of the important question that my hon. Friend has raised. There are people with great expertise whose present employment has enabled them to understand the development of capital programmes and the planning process, and we hope to be able to draw on their expertise in developing still further the substantial public-private partnership programmes that are about to take effect throughout the country.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): I thank the right hon. Lady for giving us the business, and echo the words of my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) in thanking her for again giving us two weeks' business. I also thank her for clarifying the dates of the Easter recess and say how helpful it is to know those. Last week, she said that she hoped to say something at a fairly early date about any possible Whitsun recess. The sooner we can have that news, the better.

The right hon. Lady mentioned the Government of Wales Bill in next week's business. She will know that we have been extremely glad to co-operate in the programming experiment in respect of two major constitutional Bills. We want that experiment to succeed, as I know she does, but does she accept that, now that the Government have tabled several important new clauses, which we welcome, and well over 100 amendments, the two days that were initially agreed for Report are not adequate?

If the programming system is to work, it is terribly important that some flexibility should be built into it, so that if the Government do that to a major Bill at a late stage we can have some extra time.

Will the right hon. Lady also accept that it is essential for the House to have a sight of the registration of political parties Bill—in draft form at the very least—before we complete consideration of the Government of Wales Bill?

The right hon. Lady has worked hard as Chairman of the Modernisation Committee; both my right hon. Friend the Member for South–West Norfolk and I have paid tribute to her on several occasions for that. When are the Committee's two latest reports likely to be debated, bearing in mind the fact that, this week, the Leader of the House has written to hon. Members suggesting that, in some cases, there will be a need to change the Standing Orders of the House and perhaps even legislative changes will be called for? The sooner the reports themselves can be debated and approved in principle, the better.

On many occasions recently, my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk has called for a debate on the national health service. Although we fully appreciate that the health service is relevant to the Budget debate, particularly in the light of yesterday's statement, may I point out that that was the eighth statement that we have had in recent times on the NHS, and that the substance of yesterday's statement was that it will take the Government two years to get back to where waiting lists were on 1 May? It is essential that we have a debate on that as soon as possible.

Is the right hon. Lady aware that there is a great crisis in the museums world, particularly for many of our great national museums and galleries? Will she accept that the Budget did not begin to address the seriousness of the problem? May we have a debate on the matter quite soon?

In view of the considerable uncertainty that the Prime Minister displayed yesterday over the Red Book, or, as my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition called it, the unread book, perhaps the Government should organise a teach-in on that document and ensure that all Ministers attend.

In the light of today's revelations, may we have a further statement next week on the conditions and security in Northern Ireland prisons? Will the right hon. Lady accept that we should like to have a full debate on the issue in the near future?

This is the period of our presidency of the European Union, but we have not yet had a general debate on foreign affairs. The Foreign Secretary's love of racing and support for country sports endear him to many Opposition Members. We realise that he is trying to do his best and that he has not yet made the sort of bloomer that a predecessor is alleged to have made when he asked a cardinal archbishop to waltz during the national anthem. However, it seems to us that the right hon. Gentleman's finesse is perhaps not as accomplished as it might be, and we should like a debate on foreign affairs so that he can explain himself.

Mrs. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman asked a number of questions, and I will try to deal with all of them. He asked about the Whitsun recess. I am hoping that we can have a week at Whitsun, but it will depend on the progress of business. The hon. Gentleman will be aware of the pressures on time, and I cannot give a guarantee at this stage.

We were pleased that the official Opposition and the minority parties thought it right to make progress on the Government of Wales Bill through a programming motion, and, as the hon. Gentleman said, we wish to see that experiment succeed. When the timetable was originally drawn up, it was envisaged that there would be significant issues to be discussed on Report stage; hence the two days that have been allocated. As the hon. Gentleman said, the Opposition welcome some of the more significant changes that have been made, and many of the other amendments to which he referred are technical. It is for the Business Committee to consider whether any injury time might be required on either of those days should there be the prospect of statements. Overall, the experiment has been extremely useful, and I am grateful for the co-operation we have had from all parts of the House.

I appreciate what the hon. Gentleman said about the need to make progress on the Bill on the registration of political parties. He will know that there have been significant consultations on the matter to try to ensure that what we propose is satisfactory to everyone involved. I hope that we will be able to see the Bill before long.

The hon. Gentleman asked about a debate on the reports from the Modernisation Committee. I, too, would like to see a debate on those matters, not least because I think that the general reception throughout the House has been positive and because, as he said, we may wish to make specific changes to Standing Orders. I do not hold out any prospect of such a debate before Easter, but I hope that we will be able to make some time available after that, so that the House can have an opportunity to express its views.

The hon. Gentleman asked about a debate on health. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health would welcome an opportunity to talk about the extra money that he has been able to make available for the health service. As the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) has requested a debate on the health service previously, I checked up on the matter. When the Conservatives were in government between 1992 and 1997, they had only one general debate on the health service. I hope that we can do slightly better than that. It is always open to the Opposition to use Opposition days for that issue.

As for the impact of the Budget on museums, it is still open to hon. Members to participate in the on-going Budget debate. Hon. Members who have a specific interest in that matter still have two days in which to take part in the debate.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the serious situation in prisons in Northern Ireland. He will be aware that, at the beginning of the week, there was a private notice question—which you, Madam Speaker, allowed—enabling the relevant Minister to explain the situation. The hon. Gentleman will be aware also that there are inquiries into events there. I am sure that the House will be kept informed of any developments.

As for the hon. Gentleman's comments on the presidency of the European Union and a general debate on foreign affairs, I cannot promise that we can have such a debate before Easter. However, we should like to have a debate on foreign affairs as soon as we can find some time in the parliamentary calendar to do so. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will acquit himself well, as he always does.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): May I tell my right hon. Friend how grateful the Select Committees will be for the opportunity to debate their reports? I look forward to Wednesday morning's debate on the strategic rail authority. It will be a great asset if the Select Committee's work is recognised on the Floor.

However, having congratulated my right hon. Friend on that, may I ask her whether she will expedite the debate on modernisation of the House? Although there seems to be an astonishing amount of compliance between the two Front Benches—which always worries any sensible Back Bencher—some of the suggestions on timetabling, including timetabling in Committees, are not only extremely difficult to accept, but could be said to be anti-democratic. I hope that she will not run away with the idea that everyone in the House thinks that those reports are the best thing since sliced bread.

Mrs. Taylor: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's earlier comments on the Select Committee report. Some Select Committee reports should be debated on the Floor of the House, and she has been very fortunate to get a debate on a report in which I know she has a very specific interest.

My hon. Friend mentioned Committee timetabling and procedure. I should remind her that those matters were the subject of previous reports of the Modernisation Committee, and that those reports were endorsed by the House, which approved them with nobody voting against. However, opinions are divided on some of the matters, and the two Front-Bench teams are not in agreement against everyone else. The Modernisation Committee's reports have had the support not only of Front Benchers but of Back Benchers on both sides of the House, and of experienced Members and new Members alike. That is another reason why everyone should be able to participate in the debate.

Mr. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove): Will the Leader of the House take very seriously the point made by the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) on the Government of Wales Bill, to which the Secretary of State for Wales has tabled 117 amendments? I take the right hon. Lady's point that we will have to work constructively, and it would be very helpful if there could be further discussions on that matter.

Will the Leader of the House speak to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and to the Deputy Prime Minister and ask them jointly to publish a Green Book, which was originally promised to accompany the Red Book and would outline the Budget's environmental impact? Some pages in the Red Book cover some of the Budget's impacts, but they give a very partial and incomplete picture of the environmental impact of the overall Budget strategy.

Will the Leader of the House also ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions to make a statement to the House on radioactive discharges from Sellafield that have entered the North sea? They are now the cause of international complaint and are affecting fisheries in Scandinavia.

May I also reinforce the point made by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) on the Modernisation Committee? It would be a sad thing indeed if all the Modernisation Committee's proposals were greeted with utter unanimity. I would welcome—as I know that the House would welcome—an opportunity to debate the proposals, with the agenda moving forward even more strongly.

Mrs. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman asked me about the environmental impact of the Budget. As he acknowledged, some pages of the Red Book deal with that. If he has further points to make, I repeat what I said earlier—there are two days left of the Budget debate and he may be fortunate enough to catch your eye, Madam Speaker.

I understand that the hon. Gentleman has a particular interest in radioactive waste in the North sea. He will be aware that a change in the authorisation in 1994 resulted in increased radioactive discharge limits. The Environment Agency has just completed public consultation on draft new authorisations which will reduce discharge limits. I hope that that will reassure him that the Government share his concern and are keen to take action in an attempt to minimise the problems.

The hon. Gentleman is right in his comments about the Modernisation Committee. We cannot expect unanimity, but, so far, the responses that we have received to our proposals have, by and large, been positive. However, it remains to be seen whether there will be such a level of agreement when we discuss such issues as electronic voting or even the timing of sittings of the House.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): In view of the way in which Tory Members have done their very best to destroy the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) to ban hunting with dogs, is my right hon. Friend aware that there is very strong feeling among Labour Members that the measure should be discussed in Government time? Even if the Government cannot rescue the Bill—although one wishes that they would—may we have a statement that, at least in the lifetime of this Parliament, the issue will be debated in Government time so that that barbaric sport can be stopped for ever? That is what Labour Members want. Undoubtedly, a large majority in the country want the House of Commons and Parliament to take the necessary action to stop hunting with dogs.

Mrs. Taylor: I am glad that my hon. Friend makes it clear that if the Bill fails, it will be due to the actions of Conservative Members and not the Government. The Government have always made it clear that there is no question of making Government time available for any private Member's Bill during this Session, and it would be wrong to treat the Bill to which he refers differently from any other. We have said on a number of occasions that we intend to keep the issue under review; that remains our position.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): May I remind the right hon. Lady of the Government's clear commitment to produce a White Paper on the future of London's government in the week beginning 23 March? Therefore, may we expect next week the White Paper and a statement from the Deputy Prime Minister, together with another statement on the future of London Transport underground finance? Is it not the case that the modernisation of Britain is going ahead only in rhetorical terms, and that, in practical terms, commuters using London Transport underground have had no improvement in service and only an escalation in fares?

Mrs. Taylor: I believe that my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister will be in a position to make a statement about the government of London next week, as promised. I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman gives me the opportunity to mention that. As for London underground—unusually, but because of the importance of the issue—my right hon. Friend will be in a position to make a statement tomorrow.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): On 24 February, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made a statement on Iraq during which I asked what the Government intended to do to advance democracy, peace and economic and social progress there. My right hon. Friend said twice that we will do what we can. May we have a debate on how the Iraqi people can be assisted in their plight, as the problem has not gone away?

Mrs. Taylor: Both the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary have mentioned the need for follow-up action along those lines. My hon. Friend will not be surprised that I cannot promise another debate on Iraq in the near future. However, he will be aware, as he has participated in such debates on previous occasions, that we always have an open three-hour debate on the Adjournment before each recess; he may be able to raise that topic then.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): I am sure that the Leader of the House is aware that the Highlands and Islands Convention is meeting on 3 April. Could she arrange for a statement from the Department of Trade and Industry or a full debate in Government time on European Union structural funds—an issue which is important not just to the highlands and islands, but to many others who want to know the Government's approach to negotiation in the next few months?

Mrs. Taylor: I am aware of that meeting. We have tried to arrange business in the House to accommodate it. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade has made our position on EU structural funds very clear. Although there have been some concessions, there is still a good deal of negotiation ahead of us. We are willing to contribute to the costs of enlargement, but that must be done on a fair basis, taking account of all the factors. There may be more information available by the time of the meeting to which the hon. Lady refers.

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley): Will my right hon. Friend find time for an early debate on the consultation processes on applications for opencast mining, in view of events in my constituency earlier this week, when a parish council met to consider the threefold extension of the Trinity opencast site? I am concerned that there may be similar problems elsewhere. The parish council chairman, who owns part of the site, allowed in only 16 members of the public, was not heard to declare his interest, allowed a vote to be taken in secret, and vacated the chair only just before the vote was taken. We should consider whether there are similar problems throughout the country.

Mrs. Taylor: My hon. Friend raises a series of unusual circumstances relating to one application. I shall pass her concerns on to the relevant Ministers. She will know that the consultation period has now been completed and that Ministers are entering further discussions on the issue. I shall make sure that my hon. Friends make further inquiries about the procedures followed in the case that she has raised.

Mr. William Thompson (West Tyrone): I note what the Leader of the House has said about the scandalous situation in the Maze. She said that the matter was dealt with in the private notice question at the beginning of the week, and she mentioned that an inquiry is going on. I understand that it has been completed and the report is now with Ministers in the Northern Ireland Office. Will she review her decision? When that report becomes public, can we have a debate? The situation is serious—indeed, it is a laughing stock in the press and other media, as well as among the ordinary people in the street in the United Kingdom. We should have time to discuss such a scandalous state of affairs in a part of the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Taylor: It would be wrong to anticipate the conclusions of any report by promising a debate or saying that one was needed. I shall bear in mind the hon. Gentleman's request.

Mr. Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the welcome news today that the Korean car giant Daewoo has invested £160 million in Britain? I understand that the joint investment with Birmingham-based LDV will secure 1,500 jobs and create

2,000 new ones. LDV is a van manufacturing company which almost went out of business because of the neglect of manufacturing under the previous Government. Will my right hon. Friend consider making Government time available for a debate on the Government's approach to investment in vehicle manufacturing?

Mrs. Taylor: I am sure that my hon. Friend will be more than delighted with the announcement and the security of jobs in his area. It is a good news story, but, as I have said to other colleagues on other occasions, it is not always possible to find time even to debate good news.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): Will the right hon. Lady ensure—even given her often expressed views on the difficulty of finding time for a further foreign affairs debate, which I perfectly understand—that the Foreign Secretary has an opportunity to make a statement on how he had to cope with the shockingly petulant and bad-mannered reaction of the Israeli Government to his visit to Israel? Does she agree that the middle east peace process, and the role of Europe and the United Kingdom in it, is of substantial importance to this country's interests and that, at the very least, the Foreign Secretary should have the opportunity of making a statement to the House?

Mrs. Taylor: I know that the hon. Gentleman has a long-term interest in this matter. Indeed, he was one of those who were very keen to ensure that the Foreign Secretary was active in this regard. The Foreign Secretary makes statements to the House whenever there is anything specific to report. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that it is important for this country that progress should be made in the middle east peace process. I hope that, during the summer, we will find time for a full debate on foreign affairs. When there is anything specific that is important enough to warrant a statement on the Floor of the House, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will keep the House informed of it.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): Did I hear the right hon. Lady correctly when she said that the Deputy Prime Minister would make a statement tomorrow on London matters? If that is so, will she use her offices to ensure that all London Members are told about it, because many may not have been present to hear what she said?

Madam Speaker: That is their problem.

Mr. Garnier: It may well be their problem, but if the Leader of the House could assist them, I am sure that they would be most grateful. I always like to be as helpful to the Labour party as possible.

When will the Human Rights Bill be in Committee on the Floor of the House?

Mrs. Taylor: On the first point, I can confirm that I said that there would be a statement tomorrow. The official Opposition and minority parties have been informed of that, and I shall leave it to them to inform their own London Members.

Madam Speaker: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Taylor: On the second point, I have announced business up to the week before the Easter recess. I do not anticipate the Human Rights Bill coming back to the House this side of Easter.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

[Relevant documents: The Third Report of Session 1997–98 from the Social Security Committee, on Tax and Benefits: Pre-Budget Report (HC 423), and the First Report of Session 1997–98 from the Environmental Audit Committee, on the Pre-Budget Report (HC 547).]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Before I call the Secretary of State for Social Security and Minister for Women, I must announce Madam Speaker's decision that the 10-minutes rule will apply to Back-Bench speeches throughout the debate.

The Secretary of State for Social Security and Minister for Women (Ms Harriet Harman): Welfare reform is at the heart of the Budget that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor unveiled to the House on Tuesday. Welfare reform is central to building a better and more successful Britain.

Under the previous Government, the welfare state was allowed to fall into disrepair, so that it acted as a brake on economic success and a lever for widening social division. The system prevented people from getting into work—writing off millions of people who wanted to work to a dead-end life of poverty and dependence on benefits. It discouraged people who were in work from getting on in their work, by imposing effective tax rates of 80 per cent. or more on people with low incomes who were trying to increase their earnings. The system imposed a cap on their aspirations. Everyone was left to foot the spiralling social security bill, which grew by £45 billion in real terms over 18 years, until it cost more than health and education put together.

[Ms Harriet Harman]

None of us can ignore the results of that failure when one in five working-age households has no one in work and nearly 4 million children are being brought up in poverty. Faced with that legacy, it is our duty to reform the welfare state. We are determined to make welfare work for Britain, to create a modern welfare state to help rebuild a cohesive society and a strong economy.

The Budget, delivered after just 10 months in government, is an important step along that road. It marks an entirely new relationship between tax and benefits, and between the Treasury and the Department of Social Security.

Options for streamlining the tax and benefits systems have been explored by every Government in the past 30 years, but all previous attempts have failed. This Budget marks a turning point, because we are a modern Government determined to break down barriers between Departments, and not to let turf wars get in the way of achieving our objectives.

We have a clear and modern view of how to reform welfare and tackle poverty. Next week's Green Paper on welfare reform, from my right hon. Friend the Minister for Welfare Reform, will set that out in more detail.

Welfare reform is a long-term business. It has to deliver a system that is fit for the 21st century, and will last. Although the principles from which we start are 50 years old, they are just as relevant today as they were when Beveridge first set them down: society has a responsibility to help people in genuine need who are unable to look after themselves; individuals have a responsibility to help provide for themselves when they can do so; and work is the best route out of poverty for those who can help themselves.

The principles remain the same, but the social and economic context has been transformed. The nature of work has changed, with a shift away from full-time manual work towards part-time service sector employment, and a widening pay gap between those at the top and those at the bottom.

The distribution of work has changed. Despite the fact that the proportion of people in work has remained broadly the same, there has been a growing divide between work-rich and work-poor households. The structure of families has changed. One in three marriages end in divorce, and women's lives have changed dramatically.

Fifty years ago, when William Beveridge set out his principles for the welfare state, he was applying them to a world in which most women gave up "gainful occupation" when they got married and undertook instead to perform "vital unpaid service".

"In the next thirty years," he said,

"housewives and mothers have vital work to do in ensuring the adequate continuance of the British race."

That is not so in the 1990s. Women today are more likely to be mothers and workers than mothers and housewives.

Nowadays, two thirds of all married mothers go out to work, and whether they work full time or part time, their work is vital to the family income. The days are gone when women were as rare a sight in the workplace as men often are in the kitchen. Britain now depends on women's work as well as men's.

The welfare system failed to adapt to those changes, and so has become increasingly outdated. The previous Government's critical mistake—one that the Opposition are no doubt still making to this day—was to fail to recognise that the world had changed and women were changing their lives. Women do not want the Government to tell them not to; they want the Government to back them in the choices that they are making—and that is what we are doing.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley): I congratulate my right hon. Friend—[HON. MEMBERS: "Give her a job."] That seems to surprise the Opposition. My right hon. Friend has often been a lone voice in the House in her support for child care strategies. Is it not a good thing that at last we have a comprehensive child care strategy that will enable women who want to work to do so?

Ms Harman: I thank my hon. Friend warmly for her comments. She points out the fact that the Government are changing the agenda in a way that women want—something which the previous Government failed to do.

We are modernising the system so that it goes with the grain of change—putting Beveridge's principles into practice, but in a modern setting. We are making sure that welfare works for women as well as for men, because women head the poorest families and are the lowest paid, and are also the most likely to have caring responsibilities.

We are constructing the building blocks for economic success through employment and opportunity for all, by helping people to move into work, by ensuring that work pays, and by providing help to those who cannot work.

Last year's Budget launched the biggest ever assault on worklessness and poverty, through the new deals for the young and the long-term unemployed, for lone parents and for sick and disabled people who want to work. This year's Budget goes further in helping those who want to move into work to do so, by giving more active support, by taking obstacles to work out of the system, and by making work pay.

What active support are we giving? We know that in the modern economy skills and qualifications are the key both to getting a job and to getting on in that job. That is why we are investing heavily in helping young unemployed people to improve their skills and education, through the new deal for 18 to 24-year-olds.

For lone mothers, the problem of lack of skills is even greater. Whereas the number of young unemployed people who do not have qualifications is one in five—that is serious enough—half of lone mothers have no qualifications. So today I am building on the work begun by the Select Committee on Education and Employment, for whose work I place my gratitude on the record, by announcing a new initiative to help lone parents to improve their skills and qualifications through in-work training—backed, in its original pilot phase, which will start in eight pilot areas in October, by a £10 million investment made by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor.

We are also investing a further £25 million that is needed to enable us to respond to the demands of lone parents with children under five who, although they have not been invited in to the new deal for lone parents, are coming forward and asking to use our services. The extra investment is being made to meet that demand.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): Does the right hon. Lady believe that the pilot schemes for the new deal for lone parents have been a success, with only a 6 per cent. return-to-work rate?

Ms Harman: I think that I would put that question back to the hon. Gentleman, and ask whether he really thinks that we could ever go back to a time when the policy for lone parents was simply to say, "Stay on benefit until your youngest child is 16, and be written off into a life of dependence."

The pilot schemes have started, and the progress that they are making is encouraging. They are being welcomed by lone parents, and the personal advisers are responding brilliantly to the new challenge. Employers are beginning to change their shift patterns so that they can employ lone parents.

The full evaluation of the additional work gained by lone parents will be published in due course, but I must remind the hon. Gentleman that, under the Tory Government, the number of lone mothers on income support reached more than 1 million, and those mothers were bringing up more than 2 million children on income support.

As a result of the present Government's approach, and the measures that we are introducing, the number of lone mothers bringing up their children entirely dependent on benefit will start to fall—and I hope that at that stage the hon. Gentleman will have the grace to recognise that ours is a pioneering and long overdue programme.

Mr. Gibb rose—

Ms Harman: I shall not give way again, because I must make progress.

It is a measure of the success of the new deal for lone parents that it is now inconceivable that anyone would seriously say to lone mothers that they should stay on income support until their youngest child is 16. After just 10 months of Labour in Government, that approach is gone for ever.

It was not only lone mothers whose aspirations to work were ignored by the previous Government; so, too, were the aspirations and capacities of people with health problems or a disability.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): Before the Secretary of State moves on from lone parents, may I ask her a question? I welcome the additional cash for child benefit, which lone parents will receive, but does the right hon. Lady accept that there is now an anomaly, in that this year lone parents on income support will get a fiver in family premium, and in 1999 they will get the £2.50 premium on child benefit, but in 1998–99, new lone parents will get neither? Should she not now reverse the cut for one more year, and protect people who become lone parents next year?

Ms Harman: No, because we are persisting with the principle that we have established—that it is not family formation but household income that should dictate the amount of benefit received. We are going forward on the basis that the amount of benefit paid for children in workless households will depend on their age, not on whether there are one or two parents in the household. Lone parents and married women with children in workless households will move forward together as they get the benefit of our new investment in the children of the poorest families.

Mr. Phil Hope (Corby): As a result of all the tax and benefit changes in the Budget, will not the poorest 20 per cent. be £500 a year better off?

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend is right. This Budget is investing more in opportunities while improving the circumstances of the poorest families with children.

It was not long ago that the aspirations of lone mothers were written off, as were the aspirations of the long-term sick and disabled. Some people have such serious disabilities or health problems that they will never work, and the Government will always support those people in a life of dignity and independence. However, 2 million people with disabilities do work, and over 1 million more say that they would like to work but are not working.

That is why we are investing £195 million to identify the best ways of helping disabled people who want to work to find work. We are piloting a new personal adviser service from October, and we will be working with the voluntary and private sectors to test a range of other innovative schemes. That has never been done before. Previously, such people were written off.

To make sure that welfare works for women as well as men, we are investing £60 million from the windfall tax to enable women whose partners are unemployed to gain access to employment programmes themselves for the first time, so that they can receive the help that they need to get back to work. For the under 25s, childless women who have unemployed partners will no longer be written off. They will be treated in exactly the same way as their spouses.

It is unbelievable that, in this day and age, these women—under 25 and with no children—should be treated as unemployable by virtue of the fact that they are married to an unemployed man. Women do not view themselves just as dependants of their partners, and this modernising Government will not treat them as such. Women with children whose husbands or partners are unemployed can also choose to join the welfare-to-work programme, but for them—as for lone mothers—the programme will be entirely voluntary.

In addition, we are helping people to move into work by taking benefit obstacles out of the system. New rules to link periods of benefit entitlement will mean that sick and disabled people and lone parents who want to work will no longer have to worry about any financial risk involved in taking a job which may not work out. Lone parents in receipt of income support before April 1998 will be able to take a job knowing that they will return to the same rate of benefit if it does not work out within three months. People who leave incapacity benefit to take a job will be able to return to benefit at whatever rate they were previously being paid if the job falls through within a year, avoiding the risk of possibly losing as much as £40 a week in benefit.

We will help disabled people to play a fuller role in their communities and to take a step towards paid work by abolishing the rule limiting voluntary work to 16 hours a week for those on incapacity benefits. As from October, disabled people who want to make a contribution to the community will no longer lose any benefit, however many hours they work on a voluntary basis.

Dr. Stephen Ladyman (South Thanet): I very much welcome that statement from my right hon. Friend. Many of the disabled people who have come to see me have expressed the need to be able to return to benefit in the way that she has described. One of the barriers preventing the disabled from working is the fact that sometimes they cannot work within the normal patterns that the rest of us can cope with. Will these innovative programmes consider the possibility that disabled people might be able to make a contribution, but in a different way from able-bodied people?

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend makes a very important point. We must recognise that there must be more flexible benefit patterns for people whose health condition might fluctuate, and more flexible working patterns must be available from employers. We mean business about this—we are serious. We are not happy that 1 million people are simply excluded from the jobs they might want to do because they have health problems or a disability. We must be able to respond to their capacities and abilities and not simply preside over a system which continues to pay them but writes them off.

The next part of our strategy is to make sure that work pays. This Budget helps us take a further major step forward. The introduction of the new working families tax credit—I pay tribute to the work of the Select Committee on Social Security on the issue—together with the national minimum wage, will not only make sure work pays, but will bring greater rewards for work by helping lower and middle-income families with children to keep more of what they earn.

The system will guarantee a minimum income of at least £180 a week for all families where someone works full time. It will guarantee that no working family pays any income tax at all on earnings below £220 a week. It will put a stop to the penal rates of marginal tax which have meant that some low-paid employees have had to pay back more than a pound for every extra pound earned.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford): Is the working families tax credit available to the self-employed? If not, why not? Is that not an irrational and invidious discrimination?

Ms Harman: The working families tax credit is available for people in employment, and the hon. Gentleman is right to place on the agenda further proposals to help people prosper through work, whether they are employed or self-employed. It is a major step forward, but further developments will have to be considered.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I am happy to acknowledge that the Government have responded positively to most of the ideas of the Select Committee in terms of the working families tax credit. However, the biggest barrier to work identified by the Government's research is the difficulty with housing benefit. Responsibility for housing benefit is split with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, but it would help if the Secretary of State could say a word about the Government's plans for dealing with it in the future.

Ms Harman: We are concerned about the way in which housing benefit is operating, as we do not believe it is contributing to housing policy in the way it should. One of its problems is that it does not fit with our commitment to ensure that every part of the benefits system contains no disincentives to work—and, indeed, provides incentives. Together with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, we are reviewing the interaction of housing policy and housing benefit, and we will bring forward proposals for consultation shortly. We are well aware of the evidence to the Select Committee—and the Committee's report—which suggests that this matter needs further action.

The new disabled persons tax credit will bring greater rewards from work for people whose earnings are limited by long-term sickness or disability. Their new tax credit will be more generous than the disability working allowance that it replaces, with a lower taper and higher earnings thresholds. We are modernising the system to take account of the aspirations of disabled people in the workplace.

As part of modernising the system to take account of women's role in the workplace and their responsibilities in the home, the Budget takes a major step forward towards a national child care strategy for Britain—the key elements of which are quality, accessibility and affordability. For the first time, the Budget makes high-quality child care affordable for all families. We are providing low-income families with the cash they need to meet the costs of registered child care through the new child care tax credit. Parents will receive up to £70 a week towards the cost of their child care for one child, and up to £105 a week for two or more.

All families below an upper earnings cut-off will receive at least 70 per cent. of their child care costs, and changes to benefit rules will ensure that the lowest earners get even more. It will not just be the lowest earners who benefit—although they will benefit the most. A lone parent with two children under 11 may still be eligible for some child care tax credit even if her income reaches £30,000 a year, and a typical lone parent with one child and an income of up to £15,000 a year is still likely to be paid a full 70 per cent. of her child care costs.

Those changes, together with the announced £300 million investment in out-of-school child care, mark substantial progress in our national child care strategy for Britain. A Green Paper setting out that strategy in full will be published after Easter. I am truly proud of the progress that my right hon. Friends the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Education and Employment and I have been able to make in delivering that manifesto promise in such a short time. We shall support parents by offering them choice backed up with opportunities, and opportunities backed up with real investment.

That is important for children, for their parents and for the economy. It is important for children because good child care can give them a head start, offering them educational and social opportunities before they start school, regardless of whether their mother works. It is important for parents because it is what they want—the waiting lists for nurseries, after-school clubs and child minders are endless—as child care helps them to support their families by working, so that they can bring up their children on income from work, not benefits, and thereby break the cycle of joblessness and social exclusion. Child care is important because Britain's economy depends on women's work—as does the welfare of their families.

What happens in the workplace is also crucial if we are to ensure that people have opportunities to work—change in the workplace must be part of welfare to work. That means ensuring greater access for disabled people and tackling discrimination through our disability rights commission. For lone mothers—indeed, all mothers—it means that we must ensure that employment is family friendly, so that women can balance their responsibilities at home and at work.

Our changes to the tax and benefit systems—supported by the changes to the national insurance system that were announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on Tuesday—will increase the rewards from work for millions of working people. We shall abolish the entry fee for both employers' and employees' national insurance, cut the cost of employing lower-paid workers by raising to £81 a week the earnings level at which employers start to pay national insurance contributions for their employees, and replace the distorting step rises in national insurance rates with a new unified rate of 12.2 per cent.

Together, all those changes are crucial in ensuring that the practice of the social security and tax systems meets the real needs of men, women and children today. The principles remain true to those of Beveridge—first, that work is the best route out of poverty for people who are able to work and, secondly, that individuals have a responsibility to help to provide for themselves when they can do so.

Beveridge's third principle—that society has a responsibility to help people in genuine need who are unable to look after themselves—also remains central. By helping people to provide for themselves when they can, and by minimising and rooting out fraud and abuse, we can better help those in genuine need. We are putting that principle into practice too, which is why we acted to help all pensioners to keep warm during the winter, and provided extra help for the poorest pensioners.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): As the right hon. Lady will remember, 40,821 duff cheques were sent out. Is she aware of the problem that is now becoming apparent—that pensioner married couples who are not on income support are receiving two cheques for £20? What will her Department do to rectify that loss to the public purse?

Ms Harman: The hon. Gentleman points out an error of some 40,000 payments in a programme that involved the better part of 10 million payments. The exercise was unprecedented, as the previous Government's approach to winter fuel was to tax it—not merely at 8 per cent., but at 17.5 per cent. We expect to make better progress next year—when we shall again make winter fuel payments—than we were able to do this year. I have acknowledged that there have been problems, but we shall iron them out. What is important is that, for the first time, we gave £20 to all pensioner households and £50 to the poorest pensioner households, in which the pensioners were on income support.

Mr. Burns: Will the right hon. Lady now deal with the second point of my question? I asked her about the new problem whereby pensioners who are married couples and who are not in receipt of income support are being sent two cheques and twice the amount of money, and not the single cheque of £20? What will her Department do to correct that problem? Many pensioners are not sure whether they should cash the cheques or return one, and they are not receiving clear advice when they ring up the Benefits Agency.

Ms Harman: Two pensioners who live together should receive two cheques at £10; a pensioner who lives on his or her own should receive £20. Administrative errors are inevitable when payments to 8 million pensioners are made. That is one of the reasons why we invested in a public information campaign, backed by television and newspaper advertising, which the hon. Gentleman has gone to great lengths to criticise. We want people to have the information about their entitlements.

Mr. Burns: What is the right hon. Lady going to do about the mistake?

Ms Harman: I have answered the hon. Gentleman's question. He is merely nit-picking. We are making unprecedented payments, which is a big change from the behaviour of the previous Government, who put tax on fuel. He has not decided whether we are paying too little or too much—he is still trying to find his role, and I look forward to the time when he has sorted himself out.

Last week, I announced nine new pilot schemes to find the best ways in which to get more automatic help to the 1 million pensioners who do not claim the income support to which they are entitled.

In the Budget, we are making an extra £1.2 billion a year available to give more support to children and to direct extra resources to the poorest children. All parents—both in work and out of work—have to bear extra costs and responsibilities in bringing up their children. Child benefit remains the fairest, most efficient and most cost-effective way in which to recognise those costs and responsibilities.

That is why, from April 1999, the Government will increase the amount of child benefit for the eldest child by £2.50 to around £14 a week. The same increase will be made to the family premium in income support, jobseeker's allowance, housing benefit and council tax benefit to ensure that low-income families also gain from the change.

As the Chancellor said on Tuesday, we can and should do even more on child benefit. If child benefit is increased in future, there is a case for higher-rate taxpayers to pay tax on it—that must be right in principle. We shall bring forward detailed recommendations for reform.

Some families need more help than others, and the case for additional support for children in poorer families is strong. However, that support needs to be provided on the basis not of family structure—whether there are one or two parents—but of the needs of the children. It is important that we provide better help when families need it most, which, as research has shown, is in the children's early years. I pay tribute to the research work carried out by the Joseph Rowntree foundation, which showed that the adequacy of benefits was a particular problem in relation to children aged up to 11, rather than to those aged 11 to 16.

That is why we are targeting extra help to the poorest families with younger children—we shall increase the allowance by £2.50 a week for children under the age of 11 in all the income-related benefits. That means that a family on income support with two children under 11 will be £7.50 a week better off.

The Budget shows that welfare reform is already happening in practice. We have set the direction, by building on principles that claim a direct lineage from the original chief architect of the welfare state. We have set the method, by applying those principles to a modern setting and by working with the grain of change in the wider society. We are making sound progress, delivering the results.

Next week, we shall publish our welfare reform Green Paper, to take forward the national debate on welfare reform for the 21st century.

This week's Budget and next week's Green Paper show that we now have a modern Government with a third way to tackle poverty and social exclusion, rejecting the right's view that one can tackle poverty simply by freeing up markets and relying on wealth to trickle down, and rejecting, too, the old left's view that one can tackle poverty simply by raising benefits. Instead, our approach, which is taken forward in the Budget, is to help people who can work to get work, so that they can look after themselves, and to free resources to invest in health and education and get better help to those who cannot work. This Budget has helped with work for those who can and security for those who cannot.

5.9 pm

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green): First, I must thank the Secretary of State for her courtesy in sending me a letter to outline some of the changes in the Budget. I appreciate that and I shall look at it in the next few days as those changes are implemented.

Like all Budgets, Tuesday's Budget will take time to bed down. Much of the previous Budget was welcomed at the time, but now, 10 months afterwards, a great deal of it is being rejected by many of those same pundits who welcomed it. This Budget is no different.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) made clear in yesterday's debate that Tuesday's Budget amounted to a series of broken pledges. It seemed to have been conducted by a system of smoke and mirrors; there was little detail as the Chancellor glided over some of the more complex changes, preferring to say little and suggest a great deal.

As the Chancellor kept repeating, everyone supports the idea of getting people off benefit and into work. Every hon. Member is bound to accept that as a key criterion for any Government in reforming welfare. The real question that we must ask is to what extent the Budget and the changes that we have seen so far will produce that effect.

For obvious reasons, I shall say nothing about the welfare reforms that are likely to come in the Green Paper—they are likely to be produced next week and we will wait to discuss them—but I find it strange that Tuesday's Budget contains a major change in the tax system, which affects social security, but we have to wait until the Green Paper is published, after the Budget, to find out to what degree those reforms have affected the Chancellor's thinking. No doubt the Minister of State will tell us all when the time comes.

The real question for the Secretary of State and her right hon. Friends is to what extent they expect unemployment to fall—she suggested that it would. Will the right hon. Lady now commit herself to a figure, a proportion or a percentage by which she envisages unemployment falling as a direct result of all the changes that she is implementing in the new deal? So far, we have had little commitment on that and if the right hon. Lady wants to give me a figure, I am happy to give way and allow her to do so.

We intend to monitor closely the pilot programmes designed to encourage disabled people back into work. There is much detail to be considered there. I shall wait to find out how that scheme progresses before deciding whether it is successful. Anything that assists disabled people to get back to work or to get more meaningful employment has to be welcomed; the question is to what degree the scheme will work and how it will be targeted. We will wait and see how it develops.

I shall deal with three or four of the major changes that have taken place.

Mr. Hope: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way and I welcome the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), who has decided to take his seat on the Opposition Front Bench this afternoon—he is obviously back in favour. If the Conservative party ever reached Government again, would they repeal the working families tax credit now that a Labour Government have introduced it to help the poorest families?

Mr. Duncan Smith: The hon. Gentleman is back on his usual form. He has been passed information from someone on the Government Front Bench and been told, "It's your turn to intervene." The only serious question that he has been able to come up with is, "What will you do when you get back into government in five years' time?" I cannot understand why Labour Members, who have been in power only for some 11 months, are so petrified about the Conservatives getting back into power. I shall answer the hon. Gentleman's question when the Government answer how they will explain to the British public that they have reneged on every pledge that they made before the election. When we get into government next time round we will do what is necessary to put the mess right, but let us get back to national insurance reforms, which are in the Budget, rather than the nonsense in which the hon. Gentleman is engaged.

The purpose of the change is to reduce the cost of employing low-paid workers. To some degree, the changes will undermine the Government's claim to be encouraging a high-skill economy in which people have high levels of training and there are opportunities for all—the claim covers not only the low paid but those on average and just above average incomes. The Chancellor announced that employers would not pay national insurance contributions on the first £81 of an employee's weekly earnings and above that would pay a single rate of 12.2 per cent. on every pound up to £440.

The new Labour Government claim as another of their top priorities that they will turn Britain into a high-skill economy. There is a problem here—I hope that the Paymaster General, who I welcome to his position, will deal with it in his reply—as to some degree the change will clash with the pledge.

Surely by also increasing the national insurance rate, the Chancellor has directly increased the cost of employing workers who have the higher skill levels and those who would move to higher pay with on-the-job training. That could put a question mark over their employment. That fact has been recognised in the past 24 hours by a number of companies, including J. Walter Thompson, which represents an industry that is close to the heart of new Labour—it is a case of spinners in a spin—and which has said that the national insurance

"changes are going to be a major cost for professional services companies."

I hope that the Paymaster General will deal with that when he replies.

That problem is compounded if we take into account the impact of the national minimum wage on the Budget changes. That wage will reduce the number of people earning between £60 and £80 a week by artificially inflating weekly take-home pay. As the Deputy Prime Minister noticed many years ago, that will force more employees up into the 12.2 per cent. band, as the differentials shuffle upwards. It will represent an extra cost to employers and create another barrier to work. I hope that the Paymaster General will give us some figures and some idea of what the Government calculate will be the impact of that change, given the others implemented in the Budget.

Employers are likely to respond to the change by hiring more part-time workers so that hours worked are restricted and the new earnings totals do not breach the earnings limit. Coopers and Lybrand has predicted that the present bunching of employment at just below £64 a week will shift to £81 a week. Again, perhaps the Paymaster General could tell us what calculations he made when considering that matter and how the Government intend to alleviate that effect.

Apparently, according to old new Labour, that sort of move would have been regressive in the run-up to the election. In the past 10 months, it has been attacked endlessly, yet implemented, and I would therefore be grateful if the Paymaster General could clear the matter up.

Ms Ruth Kelly (Bolton, West): Is the hon. Gentleman seriously suggesting that the previous national insurance system, which meant an entry fee for both employer and employee, was a better system than that proposed by the Government? Would he revert to that system if, by the strangest chance, the country re-elected the Conservatives?

Mr. Duncan Smith: The hon. Lady said "the strangest chance"; perhaps she is a little less concerned than the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Hope). I am not trying to persuade anyone to revert to the previous position. I am simply pointing out—[Hon. Members: "Ah!"] No, I am legitimately pointing out that a reform that continues what my noble Friend Lord Lawson started as early as 1988, and is seen as natural continuance, has knock-ons. It will have a major knock-on not because of what a Conservative Government would have done but because the major commitment that the Labour Government have made to the national minimum wage makes the whole thing different. The hon. Lady and her hon. Friends have to answer that question. It is not a question of the simple change, but of the shuffle-up that will take place as a result of the national minimum wage.

The working families tax credit is the Budget's flagship proposal. The Chancellor's proposal is not new: it has been around since the 1960s and does not necessarily lie along party lines. The idea of integrating tax and benefits has been adopted and opposed at different times by both main parties. Each time it has been proposed, it has been rejected, often with the assistance of Labour Members—and particularly the Secretary of State for Social Security.

One of why the reasons why the Secretary of State would have rejected the idea in the past is the old issue of wallet versus purse. She may have changed her view, but she was adamant about it before. The argument is well known among Labour Members, some of whom will no doubt rehearse it. When family credit was being debated, the arguments of the Minister for Welfare Reform were largely responsible for the change from a tax credit system to a benefit system.

The Chancellor says that he has solved the problem by allowing couples to make the decision after discussion and to tick the box. That is surely not a solution, as it simply adds complication, not only in bureaucracy but in the matter of who is to carry the main weight of decision. Perhaps the Secretary of State can tell us who will decide, in the case of a dispute between husband and wife, whose position will be pre-eminent.

Will the state take the view that the main breadwinner matters most, or that the wife should prevail? The Government will be in the position of arbiter between the two, perhaps even sitting at the breakfast table to decide who is right. Perhaps the Secretary of State can answer that point. Who will be pre-eminent? I invite her to intervene. There is no answer.

I hope that my hon. Friends will take note: the Government have launched a supposed solution, but are unwilling to answer a direct question on the main point.

Kali Mountford: I am somewhat bemused by the hon. Gentleman's assumptions about families. Does he at least agree that one of the problems with family credit is poor take-up? Many families suffer poverty unnecessarily. Does not this solution bring people out of poverty without the stigma of benefits, supported for so many years by the Conservative party?

Mr. Duncan Smith: There is no stigma. No evidence has been produced for that. In fact, when Martin Taylor was asked directly by the Social Security Committee what stigma there was, he had to admit that there was no evidence. I think that the Chairman of that Committee, the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), is nodding. It is no good trying to build up a straw man as the reason for the change: the supposed problem does not exist. The take-up is more than 80 per cent. in financial terms and 70 per cent. in numbers.

[Mr. Duncan Smith]

Studies conducted for the Department of Social Security show that it is difficult to identify, among the 30 per cent. who do not take up family credit, whether stigma is the reason. In fact, the 30 per cent. contained many people who should not really have been identified as qualifying for the benefit. If the working families tax credit is predicated on the supposition of stigma, it is wrongly based.

The Secretary of State has not mentioned the experience of Canada and America. Canada has a benefits system that is in many ways close to ours. The WIS—working income supplement—system in Canada has failed and a benefit-based system is being reintroduced. What studies did the Government conduct on that? Perhaps the Paymaster General can answer.

Interestingly, the Government were even advised by Mr. Mendelson, who wrote the document for Rowntree, that for every $100 spent, only $6 went in the end to the objective of increasing employment. That was one reason why the scheme was abandoned. There was also a huge increase in fraud, and overall costs spiralled.

If the Government intend that the working families tax credit should shrink the benefits bill, they are clearly listening to the wrong argument, because it is much more likely to increase it. Even by their own admission in the Red Book, it will increase dependency by putting many more people on a 60 per cent. marginal rate. The Government's figures suggest that that will happen to an extra 250,000 people.

If, as the Minister for Welfare Reform said,

"Means-tested Benefits, which are progressively withdrawn as income rises, act as a penalty on work and on effort" and are to be rejected, someone should explain why. The administrative cost to business will be increased and employers will be supplied with hitherto confidential information about household incomes. As was found in the Canadian experience, employers will know who is being cut in on the subsidy, and that leads to fraud.

If anything, stigma is increased, because more people know who is receiving the benefit. The experience in Canada and America was that that deterred people from taking it up. The Department's own figures show that the idea of stigma does not hold up. It would be nice to hear from the Paymaster General why all that evidence was chucked out.

The married couples allowance is perhaps the most devastating of the fault lines. There is a clear shift in Government policy on aspects of the family and the relationship between family and children. In further reducing the married couples allowance, the Government are sending a signal that marriage is not important to them and that they are in essence indifferent to the structure within which children are nurtured and cared for.

The hon. Member for Leicester, West (Ms Hewitt), who often features in these debates, and certainly in the Social Security Committee, claimed that marriage "doesn't fit any more" in today's society. It is revealing that she should have said that: it shows that new Labour thinks that marriage is in essence an outdated institution. The Budget confirms that and puts into practice what has heretofore been simply a theory. Ruth Lister, a former member of Labour's Commission on Social Justice, congratulated the Government because the Budget "moves away from supporting marriage to supporting children and rightly so".

There is a debate to be had about that.

The previous policy, of reducing married couples allowance, was mistaken. By the time of the general election, it was changed. The previous Government decided that the policy was wrong and that the best way forward was to have transferable tax allowances to rectify the growing burden of the change in cost to families. We set a clear direction for ourselves.

The new Government have opened the gap and said that the concept of a married couple bringing up children in a family is no longer any more than a life style choice. The Government also plan to underwrite up to 70 per cent. of child care costs, up to a limit of £100 of eligible costs for families with one child, and £150 for families with two or more children.

The Chancellor claimed that he was being prudent with a purpose. I believe that the child care scheme is anything but prudent. The Government are attempting to regulate child care. Informal networks currently provide support for children and those informal arrangements will, by necessity, change following this proposal. The state will distort the existing patterns by promoting new ones. Following the change to the married couples allowance, that sends a further stark message to parents. The Chancellor is not just indifferent: he is saying to families where parents choose to stay at home, "You should put your child into care and go out to work—and here is an inducement." In essence, the Chancellor has become a persuader for child care: he is trying to persuade all parents, regardless of their position, to go out to work.

Financially, the Chancellor has failed to address the implications of the high take-up rate. When state subsidies are offered, experience dictates that they will be taken—and taken with a will. In other words, the Government are offering subsidies for child care and, in so doing, will be both meeting and creating demand. As the Institute for Fiscal Studies said yesterday:

"We might see prices going up very rapidly, with the government simply finding itself subsidising profits and prices".

It begins to look very much like the issue of housing benefit and the way that that tends to force up prices. I dare say that the Government will deploy the same arguments against it in their review in two years' time in an attempt to introduce a cap.

In Britain, we have a heady mix of the highest proportion of lone parents on benefit and the highest child care costs in Europe. According to the Daycare Trust, British families pay the highest child care bills in Europe. It follows that the Government are in danger of running up a substantial bill for child care.

Mr. Hope: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Duncan Smith: I shall give way in a minute.

That bill will inevitably be passed on to taxpayers—although the Government do not want to tell them at this stage. The taxpayer will foot the bill. That reasoning is reflected by calculations from the IFS, which claims that the cost will rise as high as £4 billion—not the £1 billion that the Government have allowed for in the Budget.

The Government's calculations do not add up. Even taking only the current number of children who are likely to take up provision, the cost will rise way past the £1 billion mark. So the IFS's £4 billion figure begins to look very reasonable. In those circumstances, taxpayers would incur the equivalent of an extra 3p in the pound on the basic rate of tax. That is yet another little broken pledge that the Government have quietly hidden away while seeking to increase the burden on the taxpayer.

Mr. Hope rose—

Mr. Duncan Smith: I have already given way and I shall do so again in a minute.

The details of how this credit will operate have yet to be fully spelled out. If the Government rely on a scheme in which the costs are reclaimed, the bureaucracy involved will be enormous. Such a system would have to be monitored closely to avoid fraudulent high claims.

When children are involved, it is not simply a question of life style choices; it is a question of the structure within which children are brought up. It is wrong to view children in competition with marriage in this context. It is wrong to fund a higher level of child benefit by cutting another element in the tax system: the married couples allowance.

Family structure is very important. That fact is confirmed endlessly by research both here and across the Atlantic. A little publicised British project, the national child development study, showed how the "quite remarkable" difference in family situations of children who had done well by age 23, particularly educationally, despite the worst backgrounds in terms of income and housing, was associated with the fact that almost all had stayed with two original parents. American studies have shown the same thing.

The study is not a condemnation of the fact that some children are brought up, for whatever reason, in single-parent families, but it is an observation that, where possible, the two-parent family—and, in this case, the family with married parents—provides extra balance and structure that defines a child's upbringing. In this Budget, the Government are moving in the opposite direction: they have said that there is no difference and that therefore it is simply a life style choice.

Kali Mountford: The hon. Gentleman began by talking about the choices that families may make. What choices did families have under the previous Government, given that their child care record was the worst in Europe?

Mr. Duncan Smith: I must inform the hon. Lady that this is her Budget and this is her Government. If she does not want to discuss the Budget, that is fine—but I wish she would tell the Chancellor not to bother to produce a Budget every year. The hon. Lady must understand what is in the Budget. In my view, and in the view of many commentators, this is a retrograde step that will produce greater difficulties and lower the quality of child care. It is absurd to suggest that the state should encourage parents to put their children into child care regardless of the family position, but that is what is in this Budget.

Mr. Hope rose—

Mr. Duncan Smith: I have just given way, so I shall move on.

A leading liberal academic in the United States, Sarah McLanahan—who is in this country at present and has been feted by new Democrats and by new Labour—has reached exactly the same conclusion. She has spoken at length about the link between the demise in marriage and the demise in civil attitudes. In the United Kingdom, Melanie Philips has written about exactly the same concerns. The point is that the Government have chosen to move in the opposite direction. That is their position, so they must defend it and not pretend that it does not exist.

This Budget fails to redress the balance and, as a result, the situation will worsen. As my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition said yesterday in response to the Budget, the Government had a chance to redress the situation. He offered the Government the opportunity to make the tax allowances transferable, but the Government have thrown that away. Therefore, the tax structure still bears down disproportionately on two-parent families, and particularly on married couples bringing up children.

In Britain, the income tax threshold for a married man with two young children fell from 101.2 per cent. of average male manual earnings to 34.9 per cent. between 1950 and 1993-94. To that extent, the burden has increased on married couples bringing up children and this Budget does nothing to rectify that situation—although it needed attention more than other measures that are in the Budget.

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North): The hon. Gentleman raises some interesting ideas about the relationship between the state and marriage. Has he reflected on why marriage rates in this country have declined significantly in the past 18 years—arguably partly because of joblessness among young men? Has he also reflected on why, in the same period, the divorce rate in Britain has increased to the point where 40 per cent. of marriages now end in divorce? By the end of the Conservative years, Britain had the distinction—if that is the word that I am seeking, which it is not—of topping the European divorce league.

Mr. Duncan Smith: The hon. Gentleman always makes an interesting point. The number of marriages producing children has fallen from 81 per cent. to just under 70 per cent., so three quarters of all children will still be brought up by married parents. That is an important factor, although the number has fallen. The hon. Gentleman has supported my argument. I had hoped that this Government would do something about the problem of divorce rates. The experience is by no means unique to Britain—it is even worse in the United States. The problem is not quite so bad in parts of Europe, but that is changing. It is time for Government to act. The point is that the Government should have addressed that issue in the Budget, but they have moved in the opposite direction and are likely to exacerbate rather than ameliorate the problem.

[Mr. Duncan Smith]

Families have funded benefits and the expansion of the welfare state through higher tax. The Chancellor has reduced the married couples allowance partly to buy off his Back-Bench critics and partly to redress the changes to lone parent benefit for which he voted in December. It is worth addressing that point. The Prime Minister denied that that would take place. He told the House that the leaked stories that appeared in The Guardian were "wrong", but the stories about child care credit turned out to be very accurate. The articles about redressing the lone parent benefit changes also reflect the final package that appeared in the Budget.

According to the IFS, the Budget changes do not just redress the balance politically but go some way towards redressing it financially. It claims:

"many existing single parents with children under the age of 11 will be more than compensated for the cuts in lone parent benefits".

The measures have a political element that has gone unmentioned. The child benefit increases amount to a cynical move fuelled by political pressure and they are not necessarily part of a rational package of welfare reforms.

On Tuesday, the Chancellor proclaimed that he had found a new faith in the increases in child benefit. Notwithstanding his desire to tax or means test them, suddenly he discovered this great element. New Labour has never publicly expressed faith in such rises. However, under fierce criticism, the Chancellor suddenly claimed:

. "Child benefit remains the fairest and most efficient and cost-effective way of recognising the extra costs and responsibilities borne by all parents. Raising it allows us to do more for mothers who choose to be at home, working at home bringing up children."—[Official Report, 17 March 1998; Vol. 308, c. 1107.]

If this is such a valuable benefit and raising it at the suggested rate is vital to creating a fairer society, why did the Chancellor fail to mention whether the increase will now be index linked and made annually throughout the Parliament?

Will the Secretary of State guarantee that no further cuts will be made to the married couples allowance, that no cynical device will be used in future and that it will be held at least at its present level?

New Labour says one thing and does another. This is a spin doctors' Budget. They have enjoyed it from start to finish. They have done their level best to spin and they continue. Labour claims that we should take it at its word, but we can do that only if we look at its words and reverse their meaning. The soundbite and sentence become the weather vane in the opposite.

New Labour came to power claiming that the tax burden on middle England was too high and that it had no plans to increase taxes. New Labour also claimed that it would encourage savings and security in retirement. How many of my right hon. and hon. Friends remember those words that were thrown at them during the election? New Labour has broken every one of those pledges.

Both objectives have been undermined by new Labour's economic policy. The Government's own figures in the Red Book reveal that taxes are set to rise and savings are set to fall. That does not reflect the fears and aspirations of working men and women throughout Britain. Instead, it reflects the step-by-step betrayal of the golden economic legacy left to Labour by the previous Government. It is breaking trust with the British people.

Mr. Hope: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Duncan Smith: No.

New Labour had an opportunity to redress the severe tax that it imposed on thrift when it taxed pension funds last July. That was a missed opportunity, because no such action was taken. It was warned at the time by the actuaries that that action was likely to lead to greater difficulties in pension funds, but it took no action at all.

All those opportunities have been thrown out. The Government chose the wrong tax to redress and so highlighted their true instincts—and will now stand condemned. They did not even offer charities a reprieve from the abolition of the ACT dividend tax credit, as had been asked for.

We can take new Labour at its word only if we reverse its words. Throughout the Budget runs the fault line of sleight of hand—do not trust what we say, trust only what happens after we say it. Labour's motto is: we cannot be trusted.

Labour failed to cut welfare bills: welfare bills, which it pledged to cut before the election are now set to rise and rise again. It has increased tax when it said that it would cut tax. It has devalued pensions and threatened pension funds in a way not seen for many years. It has lowered investment levels in Britain.

At the beginning of its term in office, Labour is already breaking promises. I wonder what it will be like when it comes to leave government in four years' time.

5.42 pm

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South): I shall try to be brief because I am aware that many of my hon. Friends wish to speak.

The Budget is based on the long-term decision making that is necessary if we are to prevent a return to the boom and bust years witnessed under the Tory spending spree in the late 1980s. As a result of that, inflation almost doubled in two years, peaking at more than 10 per cent. in 1990. Interest rates also rose to 15 per cent., fuelling large-scale repossessions and homelessness. That spending spree led to the longest recession in the post-war era and unemployment of more than 3 million for the second time in a decade.

The Government are committed to ensuring that Britain enjoys the kind of economic success capable of delivering long-term prosperity not just for the wealthy, but for the long-term unemployed, young people and lone parents, all of whom were forgotten throughout the 18 years of failed Tory government.

The Conservatives' golden economic legacy is more a legacy of debt and failure on a massive scale. After 18 years of Conservative government, Britain had the lowest investment among Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries, the lowest job creation and one in five households without a wage earner. Every Tory Budget failed to answer those problems.

Social security now consumes more than £100 billion, about a seventh of the nation's wealth, yet under the Tories there was a massive rise in social exclusion and crime.

The Government inherited a national debt of more than £400 billion, its having doubled in the six years between 1990 and 1996. The public sector borrowing requirement was £23 billion in 1996, yet during the 1980s the Tory Government received billions through the privatisation programme. Oil and gas revenues alone totalled £80 billion, and that at a time when tax revenues rose by 43 per cent.

That debt equates to more than £26 billion a year in interest payments, or 10p on the basic rate of income tax. The Tories spent more servicing the national debt than they did on education. Under the Conservative Government, the average taxpayer contributed more than £1,000 a year to meet that legacy of debt.

The Government's commitment to sustainable and sound public finances can be seen in numerous measures undertaken since last May. The tough five-year deficit reduction plan is based on the need to encourage long-term investment, and the granting of operational independence to the Bank of England, which will provide a clear and accountable monetary framework, has already reduced long-term borrowing costs by one third of 1 per cent., which will save taxpayers around £6 billion a year.

Since the May election, the Government have twice had the opportunity to reduce corporation tax and, on both occasions, they have seized it. First, they reduced it from 33 to 31 per cent., then to 30 per cent., the lowest main rate among any of our major competitors. They also pledged not to raise that level during the remainder of this Parliament. The small business rate has also fallen, from 23 per cent. last May to 20 per cent. The changes to corporation tax will help nearly 2,800 businesses in Coventry, South alone.

The Tories failed the British people on tax, and that is why they lost so heavily at the election. They had had an 18-year history of deceiving the electorate on taxes. The tax take as a proportion of gross domestic product went up from just over 34 per cent. in 1979 to just under 36 per cent. in 1996. From 1979, the tax burden under the Tory Government was higher in every year bar one.

Under the Conservatives, so-called tax cuts were nothing more than an underhand shift from direct to indirect tax, from progressive to regressive tax, from taxing the rich to taxing the poor. The changes made by successive Conservative Governments resulted in a shift in the tax burden that penalised the poor. Between 1979 and 1997, the tax burden rose for everyone except those earning more than £64,000 a year.

The Conservative Government repeatedly broke election pledges on VAT. In 1979, they claimed that they would not increase VAT, but, after the election, in the first Parliament, VAT almost doubled from 8 to 15 per cent. In 1992, they again promised no more increases in VAT. The then Chancellor claimed that there would be no need to increase the scope or rate of VAT, but, by 1993, the Government had extended its scope to include domestic fuel. That was a particularly cruel move, which hit most severely the elderly and the poor, who spend a greater proportion of their income on gas and electricity than do the well-off.

The Tories were returned to power in 1992 with a commitment to maintain existing tax levels, but they introduced 22 new taxes. The typical family paid an extra £2,000 a year in 1997 compared with 1992. The Tories may criticise the Chancellor's changes to the married couples tax allowance as a hidden tax rise, but, after 1992, the Tories themselves reduced the married couple's allowance, costing the average family £500 a year.

The Tories criticise the change to mortgage interest relief at source as a hidden tax, but their reductions in mortgage interest tax relief from 25 to 15 per cent. after 1992 cost an extra £600 per year.

The Tories criticise the increase in road fuel duty as harmful to rural communities, where people are dependent on cars, but it was the Tories who introduced bus deregulation, which greatly reduced rural services, and it was they who raised duties year on year.

The Tories in opposition still display a hypocritical approach to taxation. The Labour party in government has upheld its commitment to create a tax system that is not only fair but seen to be fair. The poorest 20 per cent. of families with children will gain an average of £500 a year.

VAT on domestic fuel will be reduced to 5 per cent.—the lowest level possible. In opposition, it was Labour Members who prevented the Tories from increasing it to 17.5 per cent.

The working families tax credit is an attempt to tackle the unemployment and poverty trap that flourished under the Tories. The tax credit will guarantee that working families earning less than £220 per week will be taken out of income tax liability altogether. It will particularly benefit the 4 million children in Britain who live in households below the poverty line, as will the pledge to increase child benefit by up to £2.50.

Through the implementation of the windfall tax on the privatised utilities, £3.5 billion was taken from the huge profits that went into lining the pockets of Tory fat cats. That will fund the new deal to tackle social exclusion among the young, long-term unemployed, lone parents and people with disabilities. It will also provide funds for the much needed investment in our schools following the maintenance backlogs that grew under the Tories. The Government have provided a total of £2.3 billion in extra funding for education since the election on 1 May.

Changes to national insurance will make British workers more competitive, especially low and middle-income earners. The change in national insurance will make thousands of people in Coventry, South better off.

This is a step on the long road not only to modernise Britain for the years beyond 2000 but to create a fairer and more equitable society.

5.51 pm

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury): The Liberal Democrats believe that the Chancellor has, in general, moved in the right direction in his Budget this year. The problem is that he has not moved far.

During the debate, other hon. Members have had—and will have—an opportunity to comment on the Budget more broadly, but I shall confine my remarks mainly to my spokesmanship area, which is social security. I shall make just one exception on a constituency matter.

On the social security proposals, we welcome the Government's efforts to give some of the poorest in our society the opportunity to find paid employment. We have always welcomed that, and welcome the changes in the Budget that will help it. We welcome the Chancellor's attempts to make work pay. We welcome the fact that take-up of working families tax credit is expected to be higher than the take-up of family credit.

[Mr. David Rendel]

However, the holes in the Government's proposals are unwelcome. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) said on Budget day:

"there is still a suspicion that some of the detail is being shaped by political gimmickry rather than by practical good sense."—[Official Report, 17 March 1998; Vol. 308, c. 1124.]

In my speech, I hope to highlight the areas where the Liberal Democrats are pleased that the Government have acted, as well as the dangers that we see in the continuing power of soundbite over policy, for the Budget does all too little for the groups of people who cannot work, or who through individual choice do not work.

I particularly welcome two aspects of the Budget. The first is the long-overdue changes to national insurance contributions. It is undoubtedly helpful, especially to businesses, that the allowances for employee and employer national insurance contributions should be aligned with the allowances for income tax. That is something for which the Liberal Democrats have pressed for some years, and it is all the more welcome for that.

The second change that I particularly welcome will affect many fewer people, and will not be worth all that much to those whom it does affect. Nevertheless, because it embodies an important principle, it is worth highlighting today. The Chancellor has extended the additional personal allowance to women whose husbands are incapacitated. There is no reason why, in the modern world, husbands who care for their disabled wives should receive such an allowance, while wives with disabled husbands do not.

The idea that women suffer no personal financial loss by caring for a disabled husband should have been confined to the 19th century rather than to the 20th and 21st. It would be interesting to know whether the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) agrees with us on this issue. I may have missed something, but so far all I have heard from the Conservatives on that change is a deafening silence. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to intervene to tell me whether he supports the Government and the Liberal Democrats on that change, I shall give way, as I am interested to know. [Interruption.] I suspect that he has not yet made up his mind, as he now says from a sedentary position that he will write to me later about it.

It has taken a long time for the Labour party to accept the Liberal Democrat position. After all, the change was proposed as an amendment in Standing Committee during consideration of the Finance Bill in 1996. On that occasion, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien), speaking for the Labour party in opposition, refused to support an amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce)—despite the support that we now appear to have from the Government—which would have had the same effect as the Chancellor's announcement on Tuesday. The hon. Gentleman said that Labour

"would be giving out the wrong signals if we introduced changes in the Finance Bill that assisted spouses of disabled people."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 13 February 1996; c. 279-80.]

Assisting the spouses of disabled people would send "the wrong signals". That is not the way to speak or think of some of the most disadvantaged people in our society. I am glad to see from the reaction of hon. Members on the Government Benches that they tend to agree with us, and not with their spokesman on that occasion. We on the Liberal Democrat Benches are delighted that the Labour party has at last seen the error of its ways.

In contrast, however, there is one other aspect of the Budget on which the Government have, conspicuously, not seen the error of their ways. The abolition of lone parent benefit, due to come into effect in April this year, will mean that payments to current claimants will be frozen, and new claimants will face an immediate cut. What will happen to those who do not want to take paid jobs but who want instead to stay at home to look after their children? Will they face poverty, hunger, no opportunity and no hope? The Liberal Democrats have opposed the cuts in lone parent premium, for we realise that some lone parents want to stay at home to look after their children, but under this Budget, some lone parents do not do paid work, so do not get anything.

How totally illogical to break the bounds of Conservative tax policy and introduce an entirely new allowance for mothers married to an incapacitated husband, while cutting lone parent benefits purely on the excuse that there was a rigid and unbreakable pledge to stick to Conservative policy. There is no logic behind that. There is no excuse.

What about pensioners? I may be mistaken, but I do not think I heard the word pass the Chancellor's lips even once during his Budget speech. Labour sings sweet tunes when talking of the need to tackle poverty, but what of the over-80s, who are some of the poorest in our country? Have they been forgotten? Are they unimportant? Are they to be treated merely as having ended their working life? The Liberal Democrats have proposed a £5 premium for the over-80s. It is a targeted policy, well aimed, to help the poorest, including many who are eligible for income support but who, for one reason or another, do not claim it. Pensioners do not work, so in the Budget pensioners do not get anything.

The stress on welfare in work does, however, have welcome advantages for those fortunate enough to be covered by the Chancellor's plans. First, there will be a £1.4 billion cash injection into the working families tax credit. That is welcome. Secondly, the working families tax credit will have a much reduced taper compared with the present system of family credit. That is welcome, too. Thirdly, there will be a welcome tax credit for child care. On that, I am opposed to the view held by the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green. That is one of the few Budget measures for which the Chancellor deserves unreserved praise. However, none of these welcome changes is dependent on the introduction of the working families tax credit; on the contrary, the changes could have been combined with the current system of family credit.

The one advantage that is specific to the working families tax credit is that it is likely to promote a higher take-up among those who qualify than did family credit. In general, a stigma surrounds benefits: people are thought to be failures if they rely on welfare handouts. Liberal Democrats believe that family credit was successful in combating poverty, but acknowledge that some people who may need it have suffered and gone without it because of that stigma.

We hope that working families tax credit will break that stigma by rewarding work and by assisting those who want to stay in employment, but several disadvantages should be recognised. The devil will be in the detail and in the design of the system. The Chancellor says that couples will have the option of receiving the tax credit through the pay packet or through the Post Office, but we remain unconvinced that that will stop a transfer of resources from the purse to the wallet.

Family credit is paid direct to the mother; working families tax credit will give couples a choice. There will be little difficulty in a family if the man and the woman have a good relationship, and share and understand each other's needs. Whichever partner is chosen to receive the tax credit, the money will be passed to the partner who will spend it on behalf of the family. However, there is a danger that selfish husbands or fathers who do not want to share or to give the tax credit to their wives will refuse to do so. They will say, "Why give my wife the tax credit? She's received family credit for years." They will think that it is time for them to keep hold of the money through their pay packets, so that they have more to spend down at the pub.

Sadly, in the families in which it is most important that the non-working partner receives the money to spend on the family's needs, it is least likely that the non-working partner will have a say in the matter. The opportunity for choice, on which the Chancellor is relying, may be more apparent than real where it is most necessary. Nothing could be more damaging to children.

Mr. Duncan Smith: I am listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman. Is he assuming that if the main breadwinner does not agree, the tax credit will stay in the wage packet instead of going to the non-breadwinner, or does he wish, like me, that the Government would explain the matter?

Mr. Rendel: I was tending to assume that that may happen. I should be delighted if the Government assured us that a detailed mechanism will be introduced to overcome the problem, although it seems clear from the remarks of the Secretary of State that, so far, they have not found such a mechanism. That worries me.

There are other anxieties about the working families tax credit. The Chancellor must ensure that this country does not suffer from the high number of frauds that have occurred in the United States, with employees and employers colluding over the amount of working families tax credit that is due. It would be wise for the Government to study carefully the Canadian Government's experiences with working families tax credit before introducing one. I understand that the Canadian scheme has been withdrawn, mainly because it was a disincentive to work for more people than the ones for whom it was an incentive.

The Institute for Fiscal Studies report, published yesterday, takes the Budget as a whole and shows that, although 1.1 million people will have an increased incentive to work despite still suffering from an average marginal tax rate of 71 per cent., 2.8 million people—more than twice as many—will suffer from a decreased incentive to work. The policy has advantages, so that may not be a reason for not going ahead with the policy, but it must be considered, and the Government have not properly dealt with it. If the figures are accurate and the Government do nothing to address the problem, the working families tax credit, which was intended to boost their new deal programme, could become the main cause of its failure. Liberal Democrat Members hope that those disadvantages will disappear as further details emerge. We wait with interest.

I must add a further warning about the Budget. The Government are right to introduce a tax credit for child care, but the quality of the child care provided must not be compromised. There should be a recognised standard, such as a kite mark, and such provision should be registered by the Government. The future of our nation's children is too important to allow child care provision to be driven by nothing other than market forces.

On behalf of my Newbury constituents, I want to mention the need for rural public transport to be high on the agenda. The £50 million that the Government have promised is a start, but that is all it is. The Government must ensure that the money is not the end of the matter, and not merely an attempt to appease the countryside marchers; it must be the beginning of much more investment in the infrastructure of rural Britain. I warn the appeasers, if that is what they are, that an appeaser is one who feeds the tiger hoping that it will eat him last.

My hon. Friend the Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), whom I am pleased to see in the Chamber, said yesterday that the Budget had bypassed Somerset. We in Newbury know all about bypasses, and some are welcome. But the £50 million for rural transport will be spread thinly if that is all that it receives. I hope that I shall not have to echo my hon. Friend's remarks when the money is allocated, and say that the Budget has also bypassed Newbury—that would not be a welcome bypass.

There are good things in the Budget. Much of it heads in the right direction; indeed, it picks up ideas that have long been part of Liberal Democrat thinking. We welcome that, but where the Chancellor needed to be bold, he was timid, tentative and grudging. Let us hope that the Budget is merely a small first step, and that he will accelerate down that road next year.

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North): The hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) mentioned bypasses; my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie) would not forgive me if I failed to say that the Bingley bypass should be included in the roads programme next month.

Before I was elected to the House, I spent 10 years as a welfare rights advice worker. The job gave a great deal of satisfaction, but brought me face to face with an awful lot of misery and pain. Between 1980 and 1986, my case load went through the roof, because I was dealing with the casualties of the previous Government's economic policies: all that they faced was a lifetime on benefit.

In 1986, that started to change. For the next three or four years, I spent my time telling people that they would be worse off if they worked, which was a tragedy for me, for them and for the nation. That is not sound economic policy.

Mr. Gibb: Was that the advice that the hon. Gentleman gave?

Mr. Rooney: If the hon. Gentleman wants to intervene, I shall gladly give way. He does not want to intervene, because, as usual, he does not know what he is talking about.

[Mr. Rooney]

The Social Security Act 1988, which introduced family credit and changed many rules, compounded the problems. For example, the children of people on family income supplement were entitled to free school meals, but that entitlement was removed under the new family credit. Before the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) gets excited, I point out that, yes, there was a notional adjustment in the value of the benefit, but it went out of the window the week after the benefit was introduced, because no account was taken of it. That was a major cost to people on low incomes who moved from unemployment into work. As a result of the way in which local government finances were handled in the 1980s and early 1990s, the price of school meals went up far in excess of inflation year on year. People also face the cost of child care, especially in school holidays. Lone parents with two or three children have enormous costs during the six-week summer holiday and have no assistance whatever.

In 1996–97—the last year of the Conservative Government—725,000 people claimed family credit. That was only 70 per cent. of those entitled. For whatever reason, 30 per cent. of the relatively poor families who are entitled to family credit did not claim it: £400 million was not claimed. It is the children who suffer as a consequence. The beauty of the working families tax credit is that there will be a 100 per cent. take-up, because it will be paid automatically. There may be no stigma attached to family credit, but 300,000 people who were entitled to it did not claim it.

The 725,000 people who received family credit in 1996–97 were getting an average of £57.04 a week. The tragedy is that their average gross wage was £112.81 a week. That is an indictment of the low-wage economy, and shows why we need the national minimum wage that the House voted for last week. Even on that miserable average wage of £112, people were paying £170 a year in tax. They were getting £57 a week from the state in family credit, but they paid £170 a year in tax and a massive £340 in national insurance. That bill will be halved as a result of the changes that the Chancellor has introduced; and quite right, too.

Why do high earners on the top rate of tax need incentives to go to work, whereas unemployed people do not? Why is a 97 per cent. marginal rate of tax for the unemployed valid, but a 40 per cent. tax rate for higher earners is not? That argument is nonsense. There should be incentives across the board, and it is about time they were directed more at poverty than at affluence.

The Labour party manifesto made much of our welfare-to-work proposals. In the 10 months since we came to power, that programme has unfolded. Welfare to work has two fundamental principles: one is that all those who can work should work, and the other is that work should pay.

I am pleased to say that I attended the launch of the new deal for my local authority area on Tuesday morning, when 170 employers turned up. They have signed up to the new deal. Employers and claimants are enthusiastic about it, and everyone will benefit from it. It was a superb event.

Welfare to work, the new deal and the national minimum wage interlock with the measures taken in the Budget to get people back to work. The aim of those measures is to bring dignity and respect to those families, and to provide them with an income that is commensurate with their family needs and circumstances, rather than the misery pay that they received during the Tory years.

I shall comment on the Chancellor's tax credit scheme for the disabled. For many years, disabled people in work have received the disability working allowance. The system is an absolute disgrace, because the allowance is claimed by 13,400 people—the vast majority of disabled people do not know about it, and even those who do have difficulties because it is complex, so they do not bother to claim. Under the new deal, there will be £185 million for people with disabilities who want to work. They should be allowed to work, and the money should be available to support them.

Child benefit has been frozen. The most valuable support that we can give to families with children has always been child benefit. That is why it was introduced in the mid-1970s, when we did away with the old child tax allowances and the family allowance. It is a tribute to the noble Baroness Castle. I hope that the increase in child benefit this year and next year will continue year on year. It will do more than anything else to relieve child poverty. That increase is the most radical aspect of the Budget.

I welcome the Budget and am very glad to support it.

6.14 pm

Mr. John MacGregor (South Norfolk): Given the time constraints, I shall be selective and shall not go over areas that have been reasonably well discussed already. However, I should just like to say that I have not yet been able to get my mind round some of the complexities of the working families tax credit scheme and of the Martin Taylor report. Many of us have wrestled with these issues for some years, and we recognise that the objectives of the proposals are desirable. However, I have a hunch that they have been put together in haste and may be very complex. There may be a host of snags, not least the difficulties that small businesses will have trying to administer the scheme.

I should like to ask the Paymaster General about the relationship between the working families tax credit scheme and housing benefit and council tax benefit. How will it work in the round?

I want to concentrate on rural areas, which have been particularly badly hit by the Government. The rural pensioner has been badly affected by the Budget. We must also consider this year's council tax, because it is part of the tax system and has an impact on rural dwellers. In Norfolk, because of the switch of Government grant from rural to urban areas, the council tax will increase by 17 per cent. this year and will be accompanied by a considerable decline in services.

The increase in petrol tax will have a particularly adverse effect on rural dwellers, and I am strongly opposed to the Chancellor's proposal. This Budget introduced a 9.2 per cent. increase in petrol tax—6 per cent. in real terms. That increase comes after a hike in petrol taxes last year, when they were doubled. It is equivalent to 1p on income tax.

The car is often a necessity in rural areas, not least for people on lower incomes who use it to get to work. It is not possible to provide the multiplicity of public transport that can be provided in urban areas. The impact of the increase in rural areas will be severe, particularly on rural pensioners. The £50 million for rural transport schemes is merely a sop and will make little difference compared with the extra costs that will be incurred in rural areas. The Times comments today that for the three quarters of rural areas without a bus service, this is equivalent to little more than a wheel nut for each recipient.

Given the modern technology used in cars, their impact on the environment is much less than it was five years ago when we began the process of increasing petrol taxes above indexation.

I agree with the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) that the Chancellor hardly mentioned pensioners in his Budget speech. The fuel payment given to pensioners this year does not compensate for the increase in council tax and in motoring costs that pensioners will face as a result of the Budget. The rural dweller will be worse off. Yesterday, reference was made to the fact that BP has reduced petrol prices in rural areas. That reduction is because of the current lower oil prices, but they could go up again just as quickly, whereas the imposition of this extra tax is permanent. The measure is a retrograde step.

Pensioners were squeezed by last year's attacks on pension funds. Many of them suffered the loss of insurance relief on medical schemes. Agriculture and allied trades, including farm machinery companies, face serious problems because of the constant strengthening of the pound and the consequent impact on the green pound. As a result, a considerable number of people in rural areas have been made redundant. I do not think that the Budget has given rural areas a good deal, especially when combined with the council tax. That is the point that I want to stress most.

May I make a positive point to the Paymaster General about rural areas? I believe that the time has come to consider exempting church repairs and maintenance from value added tax. It has become increasingly difficult for churches, particularly listed churches, to carry out repairs and maintenance. In my constituency, many churches have tried to raise enormous sums, only to find that VAT is charged on top of that.

I very much welcome the reductions in income tax, but one consequence of those reductions is a reduction in the tax relief gained through covenant payments. That means a reduction in income. The European Parliament recently asked the Commission to improve the fiscal position of charities in relation to VAT, and I support its view. Only a modest measure would be required: I believe that, according to the most recent figures, it would cost about £25 million in tax forgone. My bishop, the bishop of Norwich, has spoken about the subject at length in the other place. I personally think that such a relief would be welcomed by many rural communities, and would be very important to our heritage.

I have mentioned rural transport. Unfortunately, I do not have time to develop my argument tonight, but I will say that we should bear in mind the additional cost to motorists. Eighty per cent. of the cost of every gallon or litre of petrol will now go in tax, and the cost to industry will continue. However much effort we devote to switching freight from road to rail—which I entirely support—the vast majority of freight will continue to be transported by road. The cost of that will be passed on to the consumer. At this point, I must declare an interest, as a non-executive director of Unigate, which owns a transport company.

More should be spent on the roads programme. I deeply regret the cuts in that programme, and I believe that the Government will come to regret them as well, not just for reasons of economic competitiveness but because of the impact on travellers everywhere. However much is invested in public transport, in non-metropolitan areas that investment will not displace the need for increased investment in roads. I hope that there will be other occasions for me to develop that theme. I think that soon, for economic, if for no other, reasons, the Government will be forced to find more money for road maintenance, road improvements and bypasses.

I greatly welcome the Government's reversal on the £50,000 limit for tax-exempt special savings accounts and personal equity plans. I am glad that they have responded to pressure—although, of course, we should not be too grateful, because the Government should never have suggested the limit in the first place. However, I am still worried. I note that today the Cabinet were supposed to be discussing compulsory pensions, second pensions, and so forth. I fear that the relationship with pensions has not been thought through sufficiently; I feel that the Government ought to concentrate on long-term savings.

When I heard what the Chancellor said about the savings scheme, I thought that his announcement about capital gains tax would be very welcome. I have long advocated a tapering system. When I looked at the details, however, I found that non-business assets would be treated much worse than they are under the present indexation system. If they are held for any length of time, and if inflation is higher than 2.5 per cent., there will hardly ever be any benefit in transferring to the proposed new system. That will not encourage long-term savings. Indeed, if inflation is higher than 3.5 per cent., there will never be any benefit. There will no benefit for 10 years, and no benefit thereafter. The Chancellor has missed a great opportunity to encourage long-term savings, but that could be put right by a change in some of the systems.

I know exactly what the Paymaster General is facing, because it was given away in one of the detailed notes. The tapering system has been heavily constrained by the Inland Revenue, because it does not want to lose any tax revenue. However, if the Government intend to encourage long-term savings they ought to introduce a different tapering system.

I must end my speech, because of the restriction on time. Let me finally deal with the overall public expenditure position. There is no doubt that the Government have been hugely helped by the economic legacy that has been left to them—tax buoyancy, falling unemployment, the contribution to the European Union, and so forth. Even so, however, they have increased health expenditure by less than the Conservatives have in recent years, and by less than we did throughout our time in government. It is time that Labour Members started to look at the figures, and to realise that. Moreover, the Government propose to devote less to capital expenditure over the next three years than was in our capital expenditure programmes. I do not think that their priorities are right, although I welcome the constraints.

Above all, I want to make it clear—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am afraid that the right hon. Gentleman has run out of time.

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North): I welcome this bold and radical Budget. I think that, in the social sphere, it will be remembered for what it says about employment and the worth of employment, and for what it says about families with children. It certainly enables me, in my Croydon constituency office, to give a better answer than I have been able to give before to mothers—some of them lone mothers—who tell me that they want to resume their careers, but that, because of child care costs, it would be monetary madness for them to do so.

The new child care credit is a major step forward, and, in some years' time, the use of credits may be seen as a great innovation which could be spread further afield. Perhaps there could be a new carers credit, for example. The provision shows that we can make the tax system more progressive, and make it serve social purposes.

I do not want to spend my limited time heaping praise on the Front Bench, however. My ministerial colleagues are easily embarrassed. Instead, I shall reflect rather more generally on three aspects of the Budget: work and the family, child benefit, and the future of national insurance.

I believe that, in retrospect, the 20th century will be seen very much as a century for women, not only in terms of civic and political gains but in terms of social and economic gains. As we approach the end of the century, women's employment patterns—with, admittedly, some significant qualifications—are becoming increasingly more like those of men, and the Budget, in a sense, institutionalises and encourages some of those developments.

The early decades of the next century, however, must deal with an even more important question. How can we achieve a better balance in the lives of both men and women—both fathers and mothers—between the world of work and the world of family, especially in relation to children? That has policy implications. I would guess that many mothers and fathers would dearly love the opportunity to spend more time at home caring for their children when they are tiny—just a few months or a few years old. New fathers, as well as mothers, will increasingly express that view.

There are implications for the income support system. We should make it clear that, however important the welfare-to-work policy is, those with children under five have an absolute right to stay at home and look after them. Perhaps we should go even further than the Budget in giving an under-fives income support premium to make that possible.

For parents in general, we should perhaps consider a parental care credit. The Budget says that those with more than one child can have up to £105 a week as a credit to help with child care costs. That is right, but I think that, given the theme of choice between work and family, we should match the sum with incentives, or at least encouragement, for parents who want to stay at home and look after their children. Sweden is a world leader in terms of parental leave. I welcome the development of a new work ethic in Britain, but we need to encourage the family and child ethic more strongly if we are to get the balance right between the social and economic spheres—between the world of the home and the world of work.

The hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel), the Liberal Democrat spokesman, was right to warn us about issues of quality of child care. There will be a great growth in child care. Some people will view it as a way in which to maximise profits. I do not want child care policy over the next 20 years to be driven by cases of abuse and sheer bad quality.

In a sense, we think that child care is about adults: the working mother, the working father, the politician, the policy maker. Strangely enough, it should be about the child and the needs of that child. Let us hear more about the child in this debate. Let us talk not just about quantity, but about quality.

I welcome the child benefit increase. It is a radical move. It is pro-families and a major development. I want to see more of it. I should like, in particular, a discussion on whether we should weight child benefit increases towards the youngest children—those under five; the poorest families tend to have the youngest children because of employment patterns. We should examine that.

I am pleased that the Treasury has not rushed into taxing child benefit. We should consider that rigorously and cautiously. Whose income do we tax? We say that child benefit is for mothers. Do we tax mothers? What about independent taxation, if we say, "No, we will tax the higher-paid parent"? It is an important issue. How would we do it if people assessed their own tax?

What about cohabitation? More of our children are being brought up by parents who choose—and have the right to choose—to cohabit rather than to get married. I do not believe that the tax benefit system should discriminate in favour of marriage, but it would be absurd if it ignored cohabitation and discriminated against marriage in taxing child benefit. In terms of equity and justice, I am not sure about saying to higher tax-rated single people and childless couples, "No, we are not going to increase tax on you, but we are for those who have children." That is not a pro-family policy. We should consider it with some caution.

There are some interesting straws in the wind in terms of what is being done to the lower rates of national insurance. I understand the case for that in terms of work incentives, but does it break the link between what we pay in and draw out, and what are the implications? Is merging the Contributions Agency with the Inland Revenue simply a bureaucratic measure, or does it indicate something far more substantive? We need a proper debate about that.

Some people—the economists and those who look at these matters technically—say that national insurance is now simply another form of income tax. I do not believe that that is right. There is a strong argument for a renaissance in social insurance. Many of the issues that confront modern Britain, such as the costs of long-term care for the frail elderly, can be tackled only through social insurance. They cannot be tackled through private insurance.

Let us, therefore, have a debate about the future of the national insurance scheme and let us be wary of people who say, "No. It is simply tax. Let us merge it with income tax." Social insurance is more important than that. The age-old principle of contributing to the community chest when in plenty, and drawing out when in need is a thoroughly modern concept for 21st century Britain.

6.32 pm

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham): I will not follow the hon. Member for Croydon, North (Mr. Wicks) by concentrating entirely on social security issues, but I begin by saying how much I support the principle of getting people into work. The Conservative Government did much to encourage them. I hope that the Government's changes will not be subverted by some of the adverse effects that I expect will come about.

I should like to concentrate on the child care credit and to ask the Paymaster General to answer some questions it; many questions have arisen in my mind. My hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) produced some calculations. Families who earn up to £14,000 would receive child care benefit of approximately £40 a week. On that basis, he suggested a ballpark cost of £4 billion; my calculation is a bit higher.

The Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Social Security and Minister for Women have said that the benefit would extend to families with incomes of £30,000. For those who are on incomes of between £15,000 and £30,000, there will be, again according to my calculation, a £20 a week average benefit for child care, which comes to £1.5 billion, on top of the £4 billion—if that figure is right; as I have said, I think that it is on the low side. Will the Paymaster General give some indication whether those calculations are right? I welcome the fact that it will take two years to introduce that credit, because I suspect that it will take the Treasury two years to calculate it all.

Because the Government have hyped that benefit, many families expect 70 per cent. of £100 or £150, depending on the number of children they have, somehow to emerge in their pay packets. Most of them do not realise the effect of the 55 per cent. taper and many will be disappointed when they realise how little they will receive. I suspect that they are likely to feel cheated.

As people are rational, they will organise their affairs in such a way as to maximise the amount of child care credit that they will be able to claim. That will increase the cost yet further. Will the Treasury tell me whether that has been calculated in its estimates? Indeed, child carers will also provide to the sum that is the maximum that they can receive from the tax system. We saw it happen with rest care homes. We will see it happen with child care, too. Has the Treasury examined that?

This is a small, but crucial point. The credit is not being introduced for two years. One of the reasons for that is that it will take a long time to increase the child care provision. Is the Paymaster General aware that the loan guarantee scheme is not available to people who wish to set up nursery schools providing a curriculum? Department of Trade and Industry rules specifically exempt those who set up schools providing a curriculum. That includes nursery schools. A change there would be one way in which to increase the amount of provision. I hope that he will consider making such a change.

The hon. Member for Croydon, North made many of the points that are crucial in relation to the interrelationship between child benefit and income tax. I will not go any further, other than to say that I support his comments about the disincentive effect of taxing child benefit. It would be absurd to tax what is, in effect, a tax relief.

My right hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) referred to the effect of the petrol increases. I will not go down that particular line, but I point out that, for many pensioners, the move to public transport, if it comes about, will involve even greater costs than people envisage. For example, those who are a bit dodgy on their pins will need porters in railway stations. They will need conductors on buses. In pedestrianised areas, they will need buggies to get around. All that costs money—additional money. I do not think that most people realise that when they talk about providing extra public transport.

I consulted businesses in Beckenham about what they wanted from the Budget. Most of them wanted business burdens to be reduced. There are few signs that the Budget will do that. Administrative burdens have gone up. We have made much of the effects of the working families tax credit. The help for small businesses, particularly the new Inland Revenue payroll offer, will send shivers down the spine of most new businesses, I suspect. It comes in the category of, "I'm from the Government. I am here to help." What will be the effect on companies that offer payroll services? In effect, will this be unpaid—and therefore unfair—competition and put those companies out of business?

I understand that the Chancellor said that he wants to reduce red tape. There was not much evidence of that. I am a member of the Deregulation Committee and I am not impressed by the volume of legislation that is coming through for us to deregulate. I hope that we will see a lot more coming through if the Government truly wish to reduce the burdens on business.

In my opinion, the big issue that has been entirely glossed over and in which I have taken a long-standing interest is smuggling and bootlegging. Those of us who have been on many long holidays buying wine in France know all about smuggling and bootlegging. We are also learning about the effect of the tobacco tax on smuggling and bootlegging. I notice from the Red Book that, despite the increases in this Budget and the previous Budget, the Treasury is expecting only a small increase in excise this year and that is due to fuel prices. All those painful increases in alcohol and tobacco taxes are having no effect. Meanwhile, the industry of smuggling and bootlegging is expanding exponentially.

Dave West, who runs the tobacco warehouse at Adinkerke—I thank the Tobacco Alliance for arranging my visit to that warehouse—has a turnover of £107 million on tobacco alone. Since December last year, the amount of cigarettes sold has increased from 5 per cent. of sales to 50 per cent. An increase of 20 per cent. on cigarettes will mean that that percentage will go up. The percentage for handrolling tobacco has not gone down.

We are seeing the effects of those sales nationally. They are undermining the rule of law and damaging the health of the nation. In Ashford, young drinkers were disrupting the town centre because they had access to cheap French beer. In Guildford, French beer caused youngsters to damage the cathedral precincts. In Beckenham, I have had complaints about a smaller shop selling duty-free alcohol. Sales of handrolling tobacco papers have increased by 63 per cent. since 1990. In Calais, there are 66 warehouses providing cheap tobacco and alcohol.

The big city gangs are now involved, and there is evidence of firearms being used in the Kent area. Protection rackets are emerging, and the police are investigating links to terrorism.

In January 1995, the current Financial Secretary to the Treasury, then in opposition, said:

"The illegal entry of alcohol cannot be regulated by our health policies or controlled by our legitimate methods of dealing with alcohol consumption."—[Official Report, 23 January 1995; Vol. 253, c. 65.]

We have a French alcohol tax, a Belgian tobacco tax and we are not in control of our own excise duty tax.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Lady has used up her time.

Yvette Cooper (Pontefract and Castleford): I welcome the Budget. It is the first Budget I can remember being described as a Budget for children, a Budget for women and a Budget for poor families. According to the Institute of Fiscal Studies, not one Budget under John Major treated poor families better than rich families.

The Conservatives presided over a growth in poverty, particularly child poverty—that is the most shocking. One in three children are being brought up in poverty. What did the Conservatives do? They stood by while child benefit fell from 4.5 per cent. of average earnings to 3 per cent. of average earnings. In response, the Labour Government have put up child benefit by the biggest real increase since 1978. As a result of the Budget, we have given families—some of the poorest families in the country—an extra £500 a year on average. I wish that the Opposition would welcome that because it is one of the most important things that we can do to tackle child poverty.

It is worth making it clear why the Government can do that and why they can make these changes. We can do so because the Chancellor has already taken action to sort out public finances, which were in a mess at the time of the election. Under John Major, national debt doubled—

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Yvette Cooper: I will give way if the hon. Gentleman will comment on that.

Mr. Ruffley: Will the hon. Lady concede that, in the Red Books published by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), it was projected that the PSBR would be zero at the turn of the century?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. Lady replies, I remind her that we do not use proper names but refer to hon. Members by their constituencies.

Yvette Cooper: The PSBR projections of the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) were remarkably inaccurate every time. Previous Red Books show that, over the past four years, the total PSBR was about £60 billion higher than it should have been according to the previous Government's projections. The projections of the new Labour Government have been surpassed by the tough actions taken by the Chancellor to sort out the problem of public finance. Last year, the public finances were £23 billion in the red. Now, we are looking at only £4 billion and that is because of the tough action taken by the Government. It is worth remembering the position of the Opposition on the Finance Bill.

Mr. Ruffley: Will the hon. Lady concede that all the tough but necessary action and tax increases designed to bring down the deficit under the Budgets of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe were opposed by the Labour party? What does she have to say about that?

Yvette Cooper: The hon. Gentleman should look at the report of the Finance Bill Committee last year. His party opposed all the significant measures to sort out the public finances in the previous Budget. That makes my point. Had the Conservatives continued in office, they would have been significantly more in the red than we are today. They opposed the windfall tax and all the measures that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor took to cut borrowing. They opposed the changes to advance corporation tax and the changes to sort out the state of the public finances.

A Conservative Government would not have been able to increase child benefit or to introduce the child care tax credit. They would not have been able to give help to low-income working families. It is not so much that they did not want to, but that they could not afford to because their borrowing would have been considerably higher.

We now have the chance to make work pay. We no longer need to tolerate the absurdly high marginal tax rates faced by far too many people on low incomes. For every extra pound earned by a dinner lady on a salary of £63 a week, more than a pound would be taken away because of the way in which national insurance contributions work. That is ludicrous and it is a good reason for getting rid of the 2 per cent. entry fee for national insurance. It is also a good reason for introducing the working families tax credit. The working families tax credit is not only more generous, but it changes the tapers. It changes the rate at which money is taken away from people. Also, people will no longer find that tax is being taken on one hand while benefits are being given with the other.

Mr. Gibb: Is not one of the consequences of the working families tax credit the fact that it will extend the dependency culture by reducing the tapers? As a result of the Budget, 400,000 more families in this country will be in receipt of benefit.

Yvette Cooper: There will be 400,000 more families in receipt of extra help to make them better off, so that they will have a guaranteed minimum income of £180 per week. I think that that is worth while, and I am ashamed that the hon. Gentleman does not.

The Budget contains other measures—it is not simply about making people better off once they are in work, but about helping them into work. One of the Budget's most significant provisions, which the House should not underestimate, extends the benefits of the new deal to partners of the unemployed.

As the new deal was being introduced in my constituency, our local youth service was asked to conduct a focus group of some 18 to 25-year-olds who might be eligible to participate in it to discover their attitudes to work, training, education and the Employment Service. The results were fascinating—until one looked at the small print, and discovered that most of the women in those groups, because they were not receiving the jobseeker's allowance, were not eligible to participate in the new deal. The youth service had included them in the group because they were actively seeking work and wanted jobs.

For too long, the benefit system has trapped women who want to work by denying them access to training, education and help—it has dismissed and ignored them. The Budget's equal treatment of women is an extremely important change.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security and Minister for Women said, another significant feature of the Budget is the £10 million for a pilot programme that will provide education and training for lone parents. Although it does not look like much money, it could prove to be a significant factor in raising children out of poverty.

Skills and qualifications are a greater factor for lone parents in determining whether they work than they are for other people. Statistics show that 87 per cent. of people with degrees are in work, and that 88 per cent. of lone mothers with degrees are in work. At the other end of the skills spectrum, 52 per cent. of people with no qualifications are in work, and 47 per cent. of mothers with no qualifications are in work. However, only 22 per cent. of lone parents with no qualifications are in work.

Qualification levels are, therefore, immensely important in determining whether lone parents work. Child care—extremely important though it is—is not the only factor in lone parents' ability to work. We must also give women an opportunity to gain the education and skills that they need—not only to get their first job, but to get their next job, and the one after that.

This morning, the Employment Sub-Committee took evidence from various groups working in child care and with lone mothers. They all agreed that the most important next step in the new deal for lone parents is to improve availability of child care and education.

The Budget represents an important new deal for women—it is a very important Budget for women. By my calculations—on the basis of calculations in the Red Book—the Budget, on average, will benefit women five times more than it will benefit men. That is not a sexist point—

Mr. Ruffley: Yes, it is.

Yvette Cooper: It is a reflection of the fact that women are more likely to be in poverty, and that women are more likely to be looking after children in poverty. Women are the ones who are denied child care and the chance to work, and they are the ones who are lower paid once they are in work. Conservative Members do not realise that fact, which is testament to the fact that, for the past 18 years, they have done so little for women and children in poverty in the United Kingdom.

The Budget is remedying the inaction of the past 18 years. It is part of Labour's commitment to women, to children and to families in poverty. It is a chance to start turning things round.

Mr. Christopher Fraser (Mid-Dorset and North Poole): Although—as we all know—the Government inherited the strongest economy in a generation, Labour's first Budget, last year, raised taxes. Let us not forget that that Budget raised 17 taxes, or that a typical family is now £800 per year worse off because of that Budget. The increases were imposed despite the Labour party's pledge in the general election campaign that there would be no tax increases.

Last year's Budget will be remembered as one that shook to the core all those who were saving for their retirement. The raid on company pension funds hit workers, shareholders and consumers alike, and was regarded as a betrayal by the prudent and the responsible. We now learn from the Red Book that, for 1998, the Chancellor forecasts a sharp drop in personal savings. That was hardly surprising after he placed a tax on savings and pensions.

We all accept that one way in which to control consumer spending is to raise interest rates—which is what the Chancellor and the Bank of England have done. However, the effect of higher interest rates has been to raise the value of the pound. Our exports have become more expensive, and so—as is demonstrated by the fall in manufacturing output for five consecutive months—exporters and manufacturers are heading towards recession.

As if that were not bad enough, businesses now face new taxes, to the tune of—according to the Confederation of British Industry—£22 billion. Now the Chancellor wants businesses to cope with the administration and arbitration of the new working families tax credit scheme. Businesses have to take over where the Benefits Agency will no longer be responsible.

In my work with the Small Business Bureau, I have become only too well aware of how worried small businesses are about the future. They prospered under a Conservative Government, but look to the future with some hesitation. Small businesses will judge the Budget's success on whether it enables the Bank of England to maintain current interest rates, or—dare I say it—even to cut them. They expected the Chancellor to unveil measures to satisfy the Bank of England that no more interest rate rises would be necessary.

On the evidence, has the Chancellor done enough to encourage the Monetary Policy Committee to hold rates? We shall see. For how long will the Chancellor be able to continue shrugging his shoulders and blaming the Bank of England for the difficulties that high interest rates are causing to the wealth-creating sector?

Businesses employing high-paid workers will suffer also from the reform of national insurance. How will that impact on their productivity and job security?

The Budget's success in my constituency of Mid-Dorset and North Poole will be judged not only on what it has done to British business, but on how it affects married couples, people living in the rural parts of my constituency and pensioners. Many of the people in those groups were looking forward to the much-talked-about 10p starting tax rate, yet—two Budgets into this Parliament—there is still no sign of it, and no date when it might apply.

My constituents will be entitled to feel that the Chancellor has let them down. The Labour party will have to learn the difference between being in opposition—when it promised the earth—and the hard world of government, in which it is held to its promises. Indeed, the never-never is a feature of the Chancellor's policies—he is living on tick. He has, for example, introduced an immediate rise in fuel duty, which will not be offset by proposals that are purported to benefit my constituents until autumn 1998 or, in some instances, until next year.

I welcome, of course, the Chancellor of the Exchequer's recognition that the tax and benefit system has disadvantaged those with children—but what has he done to deal with the disadvantages of those who want to stay at home to look after their own children? He has created a huge disincentive for mothers in two-parent families to stay at home, yet he has created an entirely opposite incentive for lone parents.

The Chancellor—by introducing the 12-week linking period—is undermining benefit cuts to lone parents, maintaining lone parents' benefits at current levels and continuing the same culture of dependency. He has also created an incentive for lone parents to take short-term work, so that they will not lose their entitlement to higher benefit rates. Therefore, the new deal for lone parents is already struggling. Those added incentives will further prejudice lone parents' return to full-time work.

What has the Chancellor done to encourage stable married life? How does he reconcile a reduction in the married couples allowance with his statement that "Families are the bedrock of a stable and healthy society"?—[Official Report, 17 March 1998; Vol. 308, c. 1106.]

How can the Chancellor's pledge that the Government will reduce welfare spending be reconciled with the fact that the Budget has increased the cost of welfare in the United Kingdom? He can justify it by tinkering, tapering and sleight-of-hand. The indications are that—because of the Chancellor's reforms—welfare spending will rise by £10 billion over the life of this Parliament.

Who will pay for that spending? The taxpayer will pay. The fact is that—because of this Budget alone—250,000 families will face higher marginal tax rates. Moreover, they face a third increase in the cost of petrol since May, when Labour won the general election. In rural constituencies such as mine, and that of my right hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor), such price increases are crippling.

As a sweetener, we were promised that £50 million would be spent on rural transport. That equates to £1 per person spread over three years. How can that make a difference to the country? How much of it will Dorset enjoy?

The huge increase in duty on fuel is Treasury motivated and represents a further tax on the countryside. Has the Chancellor learnt nothing from the strength of feeling demonstrated by the countryside march recently when 250,000 country people filled the streets of London seeking better recognition of their problems?

How do I answer the pensioners in mid-Dorset who have contacted me in the past few days? They have received no additional help from the Budget, yet they will have to cope with the huge increase in fuel prices. Many of them cannot live without a car, living where they do, and must somehow make their pensions stretch further to cover the increase.

It is cold comfort for them that at some stage, £50 million will be spent on community transport projects that have yet to be defined. It is also cold comfort for them that the smallest and cleanest cars will attract a lower rate of road tax. Many of them are still driving old faithfuls—cars that they have had for some time which do not benefit from the latest technology.

During the election campaign, the Chancellor told pensioners:

"All Labour's proposals will protect and improve the quality of life of pensioners."

After 10 months in government, Labour has not fulfilled that promise. Pensioners face increased costs and lower private pensions following the abolition of advance corporation tax. Many of them pay more in council tax, thanks to the extravagance of Labour-controlled local authorities and, in Dorset, the equally damaging Liberal Democrat councils.

Perhaps media reports are accurate when they tell us that the Prime Minister intervened to soften the blow of some of the Chancellor's proposals—but what did he do? He spoke to the Chancellor—but for whom? Was it for industry, the middle-income taxpayer, the stay-at-home mother and the pensioner? I suggest that it was not.

The success of the Budget, which in many ways is better than I had expected, hangs on future growth, yet we still have higher interest rates and we are soon to have a minimum wage. I wonder what the impact will be on the golden economic legacy that the Chancellor has inherited and to which many of my hon. Friends have referred.

The Chancellor should remember that the Budgets that are cheered the loudest are often regretted the longest. I fear that he will live to regret a significant part of the Budget that he presented on Tuesday and that the country will rue the day that it was announced.

Ms Ruth Kelly (Bolton, West): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in this important debate. A Liberal Democrat Member described the Budget as timid. I disagree. On Tuesday, we witnessed one of the most radical shake-ups of the welfare state, not just in a generation, but perhaps since the war. Just 50 years ago, Beveridge set out to conquer the five evils afflicting our society: want, disease, ignorance, idleness and squalor. Looking back in 50 years' time, we may say that the past 12 months have seen the first real attempt to rebuild the edifices of the welfare state which had gradually been eroded by 18 years of Tory rule.

In May 1997, we inherited an economy in which one in five families of working age had no one in work, one in three children lived in poverty and inequality was as great as it had been a century earlier. When my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister assumed the mantle of government, he said that the new Labour Government should be judged on its success in narrowing inequality, alleviating poverty and creating a more just society. This Budget is an important step towards doing just that.

Last July, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor introduced the first pillar of reform—the new deal for the unemployed, a £3.5 billion programme to put young and long-term unemployed people back into work. The Budget represents the second pillar of reform to attain those aims—the establishment of the principle that work should pay and the introduction of the new working families tax credit, which is an assault on in-work poverty and a measure for families with children.

I want to consider the detail of the new working families tax credit, a measure which will ensure that lower and middle-income working families with children keep more of what they earn. It will ensure that no family earning less than £220 a week will pay any tax at all and any family with a full-time worker will be guaranteed a minimum income of £180 a week. It represents a radical change and ensures that the Budget genuinely helps the poor and those with children.

Not everyone agrees, however. Opponents of the tax credit argued before it was introduced that it would do nothing for the poor. Indeed, only a week ago the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), the shadow Chancellor, issued a press release saying,

"Changing family credit into a Working Families Tax Credit will redistribute income between men and women without altering the household income by a single penny."

That has definitively been shown to be untrue. The Institute of Fiscal Studies argued that it was

"a Budget for lower-income families with children . . . It has been a long time coming, but this is a genuinely redistributive Budget."

I am delighted to be able to tell my constituents in Bolton, West that a couple earning £200 a week—a typical starter wage for someone moving off unemployment and into work—will be £23 a week better off as a result of the Budget and that, on average, families with children will gain about £250 a year.

Let me also consider some of the arguments raised by the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith). His main point was that the working families tax credit would tend to take money out of the purse and put it into the wallet, and that a tax credit would mean that the money would be paid to the working man, whereas a benefit paid to the mother would be more likely to help children. I disagree. I was pleased to note that the Budget did not shift the balance significantly away from the woman, as the shadow Chancellor recently suggested. Indeed, under the new system, families will be able to elect to whom the payment is made—and, of course, it will be more generous.

The shadow Chancellor argued that a new tax credit could put additional burdens on business. Again, that is not true. Under the new system, the Inland Revenue will merely issue a different tax code to the employee based on family income. That will involve no hassle, no intrusion into privacy and no stigma.

The hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green mentioned the experience in the United States and Canada. I am pleased to be able to respond to some of the points that he raised. The experience in Canada, which was discussed in the recent Joseph Rowntree Foundation report, is very different from the experience that we shall have in Britain as a result of the working families tax credit. The report argues that such a scheme was not successful in Canada because the culture there did not value work above unemployment and society did not want to use the system to discriminate in favour of people who wanted to work their way out of poverty and into better career opportunities.

In respect of the United States, only yesterday, Jeffrey Liebman, a respected United States public policy expert, wrote in the Financial Times:

"The working families tax credit combines the best features of the UK's family credit and the United States' Earned Income Tax Credit. In replacing the family credit with the new tax credit, the Government has ensured that the reform will be accomplished without abandoning independent taxation of spouses or the payment of benefit at frequent intervals through the year and without reducing the share of household resources controlled by women."

The United States has had 23 years of experience with tax-based work credits which shows that such programmes can have important benefits. Recent research there indicates that the earned income tax credit offset almost one third of the rise in inequality that occurred in the United States in the past 20 years. Moreover, the proportion of lone parents who work increased from 73.7 to 82.1 per cent. since 1993, when President Clinton included a large increase in the earned income tax credit in his first Budget.

I also do not agree that paying money through the tax system will fail to reduce the stigma associated with family credit. The working families tax credit is likely to have important psychological benefits, being resented less by taxpayers and by the recipients, who prefer to have a smaller amount withdrawn from their pay packet than to claim benefit. By reducing the associated feelings of dependency and cynicism, the measure is likely to increase take-up, further alleviating in-work poverty.

Another drawback of the old family credit system is that it runs together with other means-tested benefits such as housing benefit and council tax benefit, which taper off quickly as incomes rise, as the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) pointed out. As a result, some families are trapped in poverty. Some find themselves in the scandalous situation of losing more than a pound in benefit for every extra pound that they earn. The poverty trap is aggravated by the low starting rate of tax, with 45 per cent. of people on family credit paying tax as well.

In addition to being more generous than the old family credit system, the new working families tax credit means that families will keep more of the money that they earn. People can now earn up to £90 before losing benefit, and then they lose it at a slower rate. The amount of benefit withdrawn from working families as income increases will reduce from 70 per cent. with family credit to 55 per cent. under the new system. Even taking the interaction of the new tax credit with other means-tested benefits into account, once it is in place only 250,000 families will lose more than 70p in the pound for every extra hour worked, compared with almost 750,000 at the moment. That is good for work incentives, encouraging people to work longer or to get better-paid jobs. The working families tax credit will particularly help women, creating opportunities for those who had previously been barred from taking them by the lack of high-quality available child care. The child care tax credit will meet up to 70 per cent. of child care costs, up to a limit of £100 for one child or £150 for two or more.

Conservative Members have said that this is a political Budget because we are helping single parents and those in poverty. I agree. There is a political motive. We have to attack in-work poverty. We have to get people back into jobs and we have to open up opportunities—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady has used up her time.

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in this debate. Welfare has dominated the debate so far. I welcome the Chancellor's attempts to attack the poverty and benefit trap that has affected the lives and circumstances of many people. There are many details in the proposals. As some positive action is taken, further anomalies will be created. It is important to watch the detail of how the proposals are formulated to ensure that progress is made on the Chancellor's aims.

The consequences of raising the entry point for employers' national insurance contributions have been mentioned. I am concerned that the changes could lead to an increase in part-time employment, particularly after the introduction of the national minimum wage. I welcome the increase in child benefit. We await the publication of the Green Paper to find out how the measures announced on Tuesday fit in with the Government's other proposals on welfare.

I should like to reflect on the effects of the Budget on Scotland and on the people of my large rural constituency. It did not properly address the economic circumstances in Scotland and contained specific measures that will be particularly damaging to our economy. I was disappointed by the continued fixation with the spending plans and targets of the previous Government, despite a dramatically improved revenue position.

The Government have boxed themselves in through their economic policy since the election. The clear result is a macro-economic approach that damages Scotland's economy. Micro-economic tinkering has been insufficient to remedy the mistakes of 18 years of Conservative Government and one year of new Labour Government.

The Chancellor should not need me to tell him about the nature of the Scottish economy. However, even with a Scottish Member in the hot seat at the Treasury, policy appears still to be dominated by the prevailing economic conditions in the south-east of England.

Does the Chancellor not recognise the export-oriented nature of much of Scotland's industry, or the importance of rural industries in the manufacturing sector, both of which have been hit by the dual policy of high interest rates and the strong pound? The Chancellor has awarded control over interest rate policy to a committee—with no Scottish voice or membership—that has increased interest rates five times since the election.

High interest rates may be necessary to address the overheating of the south-east of England, but they are disastrous for the Scottish economy. Time will tell whether the Chancellor has done enough in the Budget to prevent the Monetary Policy Committee from increasing interest rates further. When the Scottish economy is growing more slowly than the economy of the rest of the United Kingdom, the Chancellor has taken a great risk.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Swinney: No. I have only 10 minutes and I want to make progress.

The folly of high interest rates has been compounded by the decision to proceed with yet another above inflation hike in fuel duties. That is another Conservative policy continued by the Labour Government. It is ironic that the Conservatives should complain about a higher than inflation increase in petrol duty when they presided over similar measures several times during the 1992–97 Parliament.

The people of rural Scotland will not be easily fooled by the Chancellor's soft words on a review of rural petrol prices. We have heard a lot about that before. Some of the analysis that I have seen from the Western Isles council and the Highland council shows that prices for rural drivers are between 20p and 50p a gallon higher than those for urban drivers. Every time that rural drivers fill up their petrol tanks they may pay £3 or £5 more than those in some other parts of the country. The additional cost of that increase alone is estimated at £60 each a year.

The reduction of petrol prices in rural areas by BP has already been mentioned. It would be churlish of me not to welcome that. However, the Government must take action to reinforce the decisions of private companies to ensure that essential car users—all rural drivers are essential car users—are properly protected. My hon. Friends and I will vote against the increase. I hope that others will join us.

The Chancellor has submitted himself to formidable public expenditure constraints, inherited from the previous Government. The straitjacket that he has adopted was mirrored by the language that he used on Tuesday. I suspect that his words brought a smile to one or two of the remaining Thatcherites in the House. He said:

"A substantial fiscal tightening has been achieved . . . my budget will lock in this tightening for 1998–99."—[Official Report, 17 March 1998; Vol. 308, c. 1099.]

The reality of the Budget is spending cuts and poorer services when revenues are rising far beyond even the Chancellor's expectations.

Some spending rabbits have been pulled out of the hat, including £500 million for transport. On closer examination, the majority of that appears to be for the London underground, which has attracted more than £10 billion of public resources in the past 10 years.

The Scottish public expenditure totals have been boosted by an extra £70 million for health, education and transport. However, in real terms, public expenditure in Scotland will fall by more than £100 million next year. As a direct result of the Budget, real terms spending on local government in Scotland will fall by a further £15 million, while industry and enterprise—a critical area when we are trying to motivate the Scottish economy to higher levels of growth—will lose £1.5 million. That is the real story of the Chancellor's spending plans. None of it takes into account the effect of higher than expected inflation on the Chancellor's public expenditure estimates. If we take away the gloss and look through the mirrors that were cleverly presented by the Chancellor, there is a continuing real-terms crisis in the public services on which our public depend.

The Conservatives' spending targets have been retained by the Labour Government and have failed to address the real crisis in many aspects of our public services. I heard one Conservative Member on Tuesday bemoan the fact that, as a result of the Chancellor's Budget, individuals will see not their income tax bills but their council tax bills going up. I can only pose the question: who on earth did the new Labour Government learn that little trick from if it was not the Conservatives?

The Budget has failed to make a difference for Scotland. The Chancellor had an historic opportunity on Tuesday, with public finances in a much healthier than expected condition. The coffers were fuller, but the Government failed to tackle the genuine public spending crisis. Public debt has been slashed, revenues have soared, the war chest is growing, but the Chancellor still lumbers on with a tightening of public expenditure totals of which the Conservatives would have been proud. People voted for political change at the general election, but I suspect that many of them are wondering when on earth it will come.

Mrs. Helen Brinton (Peterborough): I add my congratulations to those already offered to the Chancellor and the Treasury team. Those of us on the Government Benches who were listening in the Chamber on Tuesday were delighted with all the Budget's good news on its central themes of encouraging and rewarding work, supporting families, women, children and business, and providing more money for education and health. The Conservative party kept waiting for the bad news, but it did not materialise. Despite the desperate attempts of Conservative Members today, they have failed totally to dampen the enthusiasm with which the Budget has been received by people not only in my constituency but in theirs as well.

That is not, of course, to say that no more can be done. We have talked a lot about welfare reform in this debate, to great effect, but I shall concentrate my remarks on environmental aspects. There, too, there was much good news. I welcome the measures to improve public transport, reduce VAT on some energy-efficiency measures—even if those still apply only, as yet, to a proportion of homes—and the favourable treatment of road fuel gases. I note that further measures relating to aggregates and water pollution are up for consideration. I hope that there will be others, encouraging innovation and environmental technologies in which our country could be a leader.

I welcome the setting up of the task force under Sir Colin Marshall, with its crucial remit to investigate the use of green taxation aimed at reducing industry's energy consumption. I welcome, too, the inclusion of an assessment of the environmental impact of tax measures in the Red Book, which show how the Budget will reduce greenhouse gas emissions and improve local air quality. I wonder, however, whether we can go further.

I should like to reiterate one of the key recommendations of the first report of the Environmental Audit Committee, of which I am a member. The report was published a couple of weeks ago. It was our view that the complexities of environmental tax reform require the setting up of a special advisory body to examine the overall impact of green tax proposals. Such bodies, indeed, already exist in different forms in other countries. I hope that the Government will consider that. Obviously, it will be for them to decide on the precise constitution and powers of such a body. My other remarks are related to my constituency, although they have a similar thrust.

Peterborough is one of the four environment cities in the United Kingdom. Our environment city trust has recently completed an audit of energy consumption across the city. The results will be published shortly. However, I can say to you that, following a discussion with the director, Richard Dean, the audit has revealed that, whereas the potential saving on industry use of lighting is quite minuscule, for combined heat and power it is enormous. We could make, I am told, great energy savings at no cost to business, which is what I hope we all want. I shall be very glad to turn over the evidence to the new task force if so required.

The trust is also working on a waste audit—a life-style analysis of waste materials in the city. That will provide a factual basis for assessing the impact on business of tax changes and will identify areas where savings in waste management could be made. Through the green business forum, we are also planning a transport audit of the use of different forms of transport. We are waiting only for funding; the sums will be small.

Only through those and other forms of investigation of particular environmental measures will it be possible for us to make a rational and fair assessment of their impact and, indeed, of their likely success as measured against properly defined targets. I say to you that the overall target—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady is using the word "you". Will she try to use correct parliamentary language?

Mrs. Brinton: Many apologies, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The Government's overall target on greenhouse gas emissions is a cut of 20 per cent. by 2010. That is an aim of which we should all be proud. It is an ambitious target, and to many of us involved in environmental matters inside and outside Parliament, it seems that, although an excellent start has been made, time is short and of the essence. Everyone will have to work together very hard to gain acceptance for an organised and concerted approach to environmental tax reform.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): My right hon. and hon. Friends who have spoken in this debate, yesterday and on Tuesday have covered many of the vital areas of the Budget. They have identified our practical concerns about the operation of the working families tax credit—a laudable attempt to deal with a long-standing problem, but one which we believe is fraught with many difficulties.

My right hon. and hon. Friends have drawn attention to the high price that the Government are paying for eliminating the very high marginal deduction rates which some families on low incomes have hitherto suffered. The price that the Government are paying is an increase in the number of families who will suffer marginal deduction rates of 60 per cent. or more. As we all know, an effective tax rate at 60 per cent. is a powerful disincentive to work. The jury must be out on whether the net effect of the Government's quite laudable efforts to remove those very high marginal deduction rates will be positive, overall.

My right hon. and hon. Friends have also drawn attention to the Chancellor's failure to address the central, immediate problem facing the British economy: the very high level of sterling, which is decimating our manufacturing industry. That problem is faced not just by exporters, as the Chancellor suggested in his Budget speech, but by all manufacturers, as they deal with increased import penetration. The Budget statement says that the Government's objective is to see sterling at a competitive rate in the medium term, but I can tell the Paymaster General—other hon. Members who have talked to businesses in their constituencies will also be able to tell him—that, unless something is done in the short term, there will be no manufacturing industry left to benefit from that competitive exchange rate in the medium term.

Time is short, so I shall address a few specific issues arising from the Chancellor's statement. There is a continued confusion in Government policy over subsidies for employment. The welfare-to-work programme is at the centre of the Government's policy platform, and it is dependent, at least in part, on the principle of paying employers subsidies to employ workers.

We have also seen in the Budget the introduction of a £75 a week subsidy for the employment of the long-term unemployed. Both those measures are based on the principle that, at the margin, employment is sensitive to the cost of wages and the other costs of employment.

Yet, at the same time, the Government are telling us that the national minimum wage will not destroy jobs. Essentially, that statement depends on the premise that at the margin employment is not sensitive to wage costs. That is the contradiction at the heart of Government policy.

If the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry, the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney), is correct, and employment is not sensitive at the margin to wage costs, the Government should stop subsidising jobs now, because that is throwing money away. However, if he is wrong, the Government had better start quantifying the cost of the national minimum wage and its effect on unemployment.

In introducing his changes to employers' national insurance contributions, the Chancellor said that he would "cut the costs of hiring at the wage levels where most new jobs are created."—[Official Report, 17 March 1998; Vol. 308, c. 1103.]

However, at the same time, the Government, through the national minimum wage, are increasing the cost of hiring at precisely that level. Confusion abounds.

The changes to employers' national insurance contributions may be neutral overall, but they have significant sectoral and regional impacts. The increased contribution is a payroll tax on all those earning more than about £450 a week. The tax falls initially on the employer—I doubt whether the Chancellor would have dared to raise employee national insurance contributions 2 per cent. above the present ceiling, or to raise income tax rates by 2 per cent.—but, ultimately, the effect of any tax on employment costs must fall on the employee in the medium term, as pay rates come to be negotiated.

That payroll tax will hit firms employing highly paid workers, such as those in the technology and financial services sectors—professional firms offering the kind of highly paid, highly skilled work that the Government seek to encourage. The tax will also disproportionately affect firms in London and the south-east, where wages are higher than elsewhere, so employees there are more likely to be remunerated at the rate of £450 a week or more. That is another breach of the Prime Minister's promise not to raise taxes on the middle-income earners of middle England.

The Chancellor, rightly in my opinion, drew attention to the impact of very high marginal deduction rates, which are effectively high marginal tax rates. He has sought valiantly to address some of those issues through his reforms of tax and national insurance for the lowest paid.

However, there are other areas of the economy in which very high marginal rates apply, and I shall draw attention to a couple of those. Although, in the short term, the changes in corporation tax will produce a negative effect on the cash flow of the corporate sector overall, they are none the less welcome because of the reductions in rates. I also welcome the Government's decision to exclude from the instalment payment system companies defined as medium sized.

I am disappointed, however, that that definition includes only companies with profits of up to £1.5 million. The Chancellor wants to encourage growing businesses. He said so in his speech. Yet I submit that what the United Kingdom economy desperately lacks is a large enough sector of prosperous medium-sized companies. We have many small companies and we have world-class large companies, but we have nothing equivalent to the German Mittelstand companies—that great body of medium-sized, often family-owned companies that have contributed so much to the growth and success of the German economy.

Yet in the United Kingdom, the current corporation tax system presents companies whose profits are between £350,000 and £1.5 million with marginal rates of corporation tax higher than the mainstream rate. If the Chancellor can take the lesson of the disincentive of high marginal rates on board when he is dealing with the benefits and national insurance systems, I hope that he can take on board the same issue when he considers corporate taxes.

Stamp duty is another subject which has received relatively little attention so far in the debate. In his first Budget, the Chancellor introduced additional steps in stamp duty tiering, and on Tuesday he increased the rates for property selling at more than £250,000, and also for that selling at more than £500,000—[Interruption.]

The Government Deputy Chief Whip, from his seat on the Front Bench, laughs. He is thinking about houses, and wondering whether I am thinking about my house or my hon. Friends' houses. However, the duty applies not only to houses but to factories, shops and warehouses—business assets and institutional property owned by pension funds. It is an attack on the liquidity of the institutional property sector, and on property and assets held for the benefit of productive business throughout the country.

We now have a grotesque set of distortions to the operation of the property market. At £250,000, the marginal rate for the additional pound achieved in selling a property is a staggering 250,000 per cent. At £500,000, the marginal rate of tax for the additional pound is 500,000 per cent. That is plain silly; clearly it will spawn a whole avoidance industry, which cannot be what the Chancellor wanted.

It cannot be good for the country as a whole to develop the stamp duty system as a serious revenue raiser, for which it was not designed. That will have a serious negative effect on the operation of the institutional property market and on the supply of property available to businesses to rent for productive purposes. That, in turn, will increase their costs.

Finally, I would like to say a brief word about the so-called green taxes in the Budget, especially those on petrol and landfill—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman has already used his 10 minutes.

Dr. Stephen Ladyman (South Thanet): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker; I am grateful to be given the opportunity to contribute to the debate today, especially as the Minister on the Front Bench today is my hon. Friend the Paymaster General. On behalf of my constituents, I have made representations to my hon. Friend over the past few months about individual savings accounts and personal equity plans, and when I heard the Budget I was most grateful to find that those representations had borne fruit and that the Government had recognised the problems.

I have been receiving telephone calls in my constituency office over the past two days from people saying, "At long last, we have a Government who really mean it when they say that something is out for consultation, and who really listen when people make representations." Long may that continue.

It is typical of the Conservative party that when we listen to representations we are accused of doing U-turns, and when we do not listen we are called stubborn and arrogant with power. That is typical of the way in which Conservatives have addressed the issues over the past 11 months.

Listening to the debate, not only this afternoon but over the past two days, I have been struck by how detached the Conservative party seems to have become from reality. Conservative Members have obviously been told what to say—presumably by their public relations people, whom I shall not call spin doctors because I know how odious the employment of doctors has been to the Conservatives over the past 18 years. They have been told to refer to their golden legacy. That legacy is as mythical as golden goose eggs.

Conservatives constantly refer to the high level of the pound without pointing out that it was their failure to increase interest rates before the election that caused the need to increase them after it.

The Leader of the Opposition began his remarks after the Budget by saying that the Opposition would support some of the tax reforms for business, but, by yesterday, he was saying that he opposed tax reforms for business. Opposition Members have been told to say constantly that this is not a business-friendly Budget, but they cannot offer an explanation for why the stock market is breaking all records.

I do not want to pick on any individual Opposition Member, but I was struck by the comments of the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor). He began by telling us that he did not understand the working families tax credit and, because he did not understand it, that it could not work. That was a strange argument. He then talked about the effect of petrol prices on rural communities, but forgot to point out that the escalator to increase petrol prices above the level of inflation was set by the previous Government at 5 per cent.

Mr. Ruffley: The hon. Gentleman is wrong to say that there is some equivalence between the increases announced by the last Conservative Chancellor and those announced by the current Chancellor. The two increases announced in last July's Budget have taken place over the few months since then, and that is in no way equivalent to what was factored in by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke). The hon. Gentleman is plain wrong—will he apologise?

Dr. Ladyman: I do not accept that I am wrong. The previous Administration introduced the escalator with a great deal of pride and claimed it as some testament to their environmental credibility.

The right hon. Member for South Norfolk raised the question of church repairs. He seemed at one point to be calling for higher income tax so that there would be more covenant income, but he failed to point out that rural churches are suffering as a result of the level of VAT on repairs, which was introduced by the Government of which he was a member.

That is typical of the unreality of the Conservative party in this debate. Opposition Members have failed to mention people, which is what this Budget is all about. It is about people who have ambitions. Even unemployed people and those who have been out of work for a long time have ambitions. They may not be big ambitions, like those of hon. Members, but they are important to them. Someone on a fixed-benefit income is unlikely to be able to achieve those ambitions. This Budget is about getting those people back to work and recreating their ability to fulfil their ambitions.

I have been impressed by what the Chancellor has done in the Budget and I have tried to put it into some context. Slipping off message for a moment, having spent most of my life working for the Labour party in one form or another, I know that the old debates in the Labour party were about creating work, full employment and fighting unemployment. It is only recently that what some call old Labour started talking about benefits. No one has ever told me that the Jarrow marchers marched for increased benefits—they marched for increased work. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has reverted to the old traditions of the Labour party to create full employment, and he is to be congratulated. He is not new Labour or old Labour—he is older Labour.

It is easy for Opposition Members to put down the fact that my right hon. Friend has provided £50 million for rural transport, but it is £50 million more than the Conservative Government ever made available. They closed down bus services with their deregulation policy. The money will go a long way towards helping rural constituencies. It is not the full picture, but it is at least a start.

Encouraging zero-emission vehicles and clean vehicles is close to my heart, as a company is to build a factory in my constituency where zero-emission vehicles will be produced. The Chancellor has commented on the differential between duties on certain types of clean fuel and petrol. I ask him to look at the possibility that hydrogen—which is needed to drive fuel cell-based vehicles—could be included in that differential. The Chancellor should look also at VAT regulations in respect of investments in taxis and buses where those vehicles are powered by zero-emission engines and clean engines. The Chancellor may be able to encourage investment in clean technology over and above the measures in the Budget.

[Dr. Ladyman]

I very much agreed with the comments of the hon. Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) on bootlegging. I have a tremendous problem with bootlegging in my constituency. Just last week, I found a young man lying outside the door of my constituency office, vomiting. He could not have been older than 14. I put him in my car and took him home to face the wrath of his parents. He would have been drinking bootlegged beer, which is creating a tremendous social problem in my constituency. The police tell me that it is becoming a major problem. The Chancellor must try to improve security and controls on bootlegging, and he has said that he is willing to consider that. The more he does in that area, the better.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): The longer I serve in the House, the more I think we should look carefully at how we introduce Budgets in it. This Budget is particularly complicated and technical, and it is slightly bizarre and daft that the Chancellor has to get involved in so many different issues and, in one great splurge, release his plans—having been in Budget purdah—on an unsuspecting world, which makes it difficult for those of us who follow these things, particularly technical issues such as social security, to cope with them adequately.

I pay credit to the Government; the Chancellor was wise to make his pre-Budget statement in November. It assisted those of us who are interested in the areas he said he was looking at and it made the work of the Social Security Committee easier. Our third report has direct relevance to this debate and I hope that hon. Members will get a chance to look at the detail of the important matters we investigated.

The Paymaster General is to wind up the debate. He is a man with influence on budgetary matters. Perhaps the Modernisation Committee should examine whether we should have an annual uprating statement, including a technical amendment of taxes Bill, and then leave some of the other complicated issues—such as working families tax credit—to be dealt with in a more consultative and deliberative way. I welcome what the Government have done in so far as it relates to low-income working families.

I want to deal with some of the matters that I think require further attention if these reforms are to be implemented successfully. It is important that, in moving to working families credit, we build on the successes of family credit. I remember the difficulties that arose when family credit was introduced in 1986, especially in terms of take-up, but the benefit now has a good record, not only in rates of take-up but in effective administration. In 1996-97—the most recent year for which figures are available—91.9 per cent. of new family credit claims were paid within five days. Moreover, 91.3 per cent. of assessments were accurate. By benefits standards, that is hard to beat. Those hard-won standards ought also to apply to the new working families tax credit.

I propose that, so that we know clearly what is going on, and because statistics are out of date—it is sometimes two or three years before they are made available—the Government consider setting an annually published target for take-up of working families tax credit. Everyone, including me, assumed that the working families tax credit would automatically have a higher take-up, but—if I understand the fine print—it will have to be applied for. If so, we may be going back to what happened with family credit in 1986, which would be a great shame. I hope that the Government will be alive to that and consider take-up rates as a matter of urgency.

The Paymaster General is the most appropriate Minister to whom to address these comments and I am sure that the Secretary of State for Social Security will thank me for doing so. The technology with which the Benefits Agency works is obsolete and inadequate to meet the demands that the changes proposed in the Budget will bring. It is no use waiting for the millennium bug—or some other excuse—before renewing the equipment; is now 10 or 12 years out of date and badly needs updating. If we do not take this opportunity to do so, we shall ask the impossible of those Benefits Agency staff who will have to implement the administrative changes and it will be unfair if we then expect them to get the new benefit right first time.

The Social Security Committee has set itself the task of examining the implementation of the measures proposed in the Budget, especially working families tax credit. The Treasury Committee will, of course, examine them, too, and we shall study with interest its investigations and recommendations after direct examination of Treasury Ministers.

I think that the adverse effect of the Budget on small employers and the self-employed has been underestimated. I was not convinced that Martin Taylor, who otherwise did a very good job, spent enough time considering that problem in enough detail. We shall have to return to that matter.

The Secretary of State for Social Security gave me half an assurance that she, in concert with her colleagues in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, was doing more about housing benefit. I understand the necessity for that. If housing benefit is left as it is, it could, for many of the families that we hope will be assisted, soak up the whole financial benefit derived from working families tax credit.

I agree with the hon. Member for Croydon, North (Mr. Wicks) that the quality of child care is an essential issue. As a second order question, I think that someone should examine the future on-costs for local authorities of registering child minders and child care facilities.

We shall also need to consider the wallet versus purse issue. The hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) was not right in very much of what he said, but he was right to draw attention to some of the difficulties in judging to whom the girocheque should go. Giving evidence to the Social Security Committee, Martin Taylor made much of the importance of the psychology of paying the benefit through the wallet rather than the purse. We will all have to be careful and monitor exactly how choices about the payments are made so that we can ensure that the full benefits of these changes are realised.

On part-time work, I think that a new watershed may be created by the 16-hour qualifying period. Many of my constituents are part-time workers in the knitwear industry. There may be consequences if we create such a huge watershed. We shall also have to watch that situation carefully.

I believe that the proposal to protect the rights to national insurance benefits for those who earn between £64 and £81 a week will create a three-tier system. First, there will be those who earn less than £64. Secondly, there will be those who earn between £64 and £81, who will receive credits, although I do not know how people who appear on the payroll at £70, for example, will be identified so that they can be credited. Will it be the employer's responsibility to notify the Inland Revenue that they have suddenly come on to the payroll at that rate? Thirdly, there will be those who earn more than £81, who will receive full national insurance benefits. That is another important matter needing careful examination.

Again, I agree with what the hon. Member for Croydon, North said about the future of child benefit. The Select Committee, on which I serve with the hon. Gentleman, will want to examine that question and contribute to any consultation. I also agree with what he said about the contributory principle—but perhaps we shall learn more about that when the Green Paper is published next week.

The Budget is welcome in so far as it relates to welfare to work, but I fear that the Government may be ignoring people who are excluded from the world of work, particularly rural low-paid pensioners. I also believe that the Government's macroeconomic stance is creating difficulties for manufacturing industry, especially exporters, who are suffering because of the high value of the pound.

Some of the points that have been made about disadvantage in rural areas also need further consideration, but I welcome the Budget in so far as it relates to the incentive to get people back to work. However, we must ensure that there are enough jobs, as there is no point trying to get people off benefits and into work if there are no jobs for them to go to.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley): I am very pleased to be able to speak in this debate on what I believe to be a stonking good Budget which will herald a turning point in our economy. It will restructure the economy and the tax and benefits system, and it will refocus benefits for everyone, especially the poorest in our communities. Moreover, the Budget is non-judgmental; it does not distinguish between people according to the size and shape of their families; nor does it exclude people from work and assume that people who are workless are workshy.

I represent a largely rural constituency and I must tell the House that the poverty that people in rural communities face is worse than that almost anywhere else. It is unhelpful of Conservative Members not to recognise the benefits to rural communities that the Budget and other measures will bring. My constituents who live in villages are far from urban centres where most of the help resides, including voluntary organisations, the Employment Service and social services. Few of those agencies have outposts in villages. Evidence shows that fewer and fewer resources are available in villages, which are literally crumbling under the strain.

What of the poorer people in those communities? People who live in my village—

Mr. Ruffley: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Kali Mountford: I am sorry, but time is short—although I am grateful that the hon. Gentleman is interested in what I am saying.

People who live next door to me, for example, have great difficulties accessing the resources that are available to people in urban areas because there are so few buses. The village along the road had its bus service cut so dramatically that the residents had to form a bus action group to press for the reintroduction of the rural bus.

I think that £50 million will go a long way towards helping with that, but let us not forget the £500 million that is being made available for all public transport. Conservative Members have said that that is too little, too late, but I do not remember Conservative Chancellors of the Exchequer making such resources available. They took the dogmatic approach that the private sector will reap all—it certainly reaped my bus services. Hon. Members may think that bus services are not important, but for my constituents they are, as they are the access to everything else. For young people who can now get a pass for the bus service and so access the new deal, it could be the turning point in their lives.

Since September, the number of young unemployed people in my constituency has almost halved, I am pleased to say. Only 150 are left without work. We are already seeing the effects of economic restructuring to enable people to get access to work. There is money for research and development, money to encourage people to invest in the long—and not the short—term and money so that we can have a more stable economy. All of those developments will help small businesses in my constituency and elsewhere to make long-term investments to provide jobs.

In another debate, I said that the new deal would be an important part of the strategy to encourage small businesses to take on young people so that their businesses can grow. Few young people in my constituency still need the new deal, so I am particularly glad about its extension to other people who need it at least as much, in particular lone parents. The new linking rules for benefits for lone parents and people with disabilities are welcome indeed. They will take away the fear of trying out a job.

A couple of weeks ago, I met someone at my surgery who had recently found herself a job. She is disabled and had pointed that out during the job interview, but everyone agreed that she would be suitable and she was given a date to start. Sadly, on her first day she was unable to perform her first task because of her disability and her immobility, so it was amicably agreed that she should not even start the job. I was disappointed that the firm took that decision and I hope that we can reverse it in the near future. Knowing that there was no fear of her losing benefits if she tried the job for a time to find out whether it could be redesigned to suit her needs might have helped both her and her employers.

Sometimes it is difficult for employers to imagine how someone with severe disabilities can fit into the new style of working to which they are being introduced, but, with a little imagination, people can often find ways of fitting the job to the person with the disabilities rather than trying to make that person fit into an old style of working. The change will be a magnificent improvement for people such as my constituent.

A major step forward is the fact that we are focusing on children instead of the family structure. I have long argued that children are the most important consideration when we make decisions on tax, benefit and work. It is wrong to design child care strategies to suit the needs of parents or employers. I have made many mistakes by encouraging people to take particular styles of child care only to find that they do not suit their families. It is about time that we considered a strategy that suited the child.

I was disappointed to hear the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) suggest that, by introducing this child care strategy and help for parents, we would be doing children a great disservice. We have been doing them a great disservice for many years and it is a disgrace that this country has the worst record on child care in Europe.

To assume that making child care available is doing some disservice to children and to make a moral judgment on families who choose to take up such services says a great deal about our attitude to families. They have made their decisions about partners and whether they will be married. Many people make decisions against their best wishes. Partners die, or leave, and people are often left with complex family structures. Are we to make a moral judgment about such people?

In spite of those complex family structures, people still need to work because a lifetime on benefits is abhorrent. Are we to say that if people go out to work their children will be less well served than the children of their neighbours who are fortunate enough to have stayed in one marriage and who do not need both partners to work—a rare family these days as less than one third of families are like that? The majority of families probably need access to some child care at some point. Should we tell them that their children will be so ill served by that system that they should not make that choice and that a lifetime in poverty on benefits is preferable? I hope not.

My children have been in child care at times—I hope that they are in pretty decent child care right now—and I would like to think, or in fact I know, that they are well-rounded and lovely people and have not had any disbenefit from that experience.

There is plenty of evidence to show that children in child care, especially those who go to nurseries, benefit a great deal. The IQ of some children who have been in child care builds up, although immediately they come out of that constructive environment it often tapers off because the stimulation is no longer available. In those early years, stimulation is good for children and I very much welcome the pilot programme of early excellence centres that will bring together all sorts of child care elements. Working in partnership is a good way forward and will provide the best for our children. I hope that the whole House agrees with me on that.

8.6 pm

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds): I think that it was the late Iain Macleod who said that the Budgets that were cheered loudest on the day looked the worst six months down the road. Conservative Members believe that this Budget is one such. It is a triumph of style over true substance and the most over-hyped Budget in the history of modern politics. It was distinguished by grandiloquent language. We heard that the Chancellor is the "people's guardian" and talk about this being a once-in-a-generation opportunity to modernise tax and benefits. Such terms and style of language are ridiculous.

Mr. Fallon: Perhaps it is time that we changed the people's scriptwriter.

Mr. Ruffley: My hon. Friend is right. It is language as ridiculous as a Chancellor who borrows someone else's children for a cheap photo opportunity the weekend before the Budget.

This Budget set up great expectations; we contend that the people will be disappointed because it fails three tests by which it should be judged. The first relates to the welfare and tax proposals. No doubt, the aim is to increase incentives to work and the number of jobs, and to reduce the welfare budget, but it will fail.

The second test relates to the delivery of stable macro-economic management; the Budget will fail to do that. It will not be able to sustain the rates of growth that are necessary and desirable for our country.

The Budget also fails the third test, which is to deliver on new Labour's promise not to increase the tax burden on middle Britain.

The Labour party is very keen to invoke the words of the Institute for Fiscal Studies. Paul Johnson—not the Conservative commentator, but the deputy director of the IFS—said that Labour's welfare proposals certainly do not represent "a major reforming package".

The working families tax credit is essentially a rebadging of family credit under the Conservative Administration. But it is much more expensive, as it goes higher up the income scale. We cannot see how it can possibly deliver cuts in total Government expenditure. It may be classified as other than social security spending, but it will result, as night follows day, in a greater liability for the British taxpayer.

No Labour Member has made any serious attempt to answer the questions about wallet versus purse. We hope that the Minister will answer the questions posed by Conservative Members.

The child care proposals are of interest to a party—the Conservative party—that introduced a disregard for child care in 1993. We are certainly not against child care in principle, and it is a calumny for Labour Members to suggest that we are. But we have real concerns about the package proposed in the Budget.

The IFS and Mr. Paul Johnson are also concerned. He says that "the long-term costs could run into billions".

There is no sensible forecast in the Red Book of the ultimate cost of the proposals.

We are concerned about the nannies and grannies who do valuable care work in the home for no pay. They will not be favoured by the proposals. Money for child care will be claimed for services rendered by registered child carers, but not for work done by volunteers. The Conservative party has an excellent solution to that: the transferable tax allowance. Many of my constituents would have liked that to be in the Budget.

The state-registered nature of the child care allowable under the proposals amounts to nothing less than the nationalisation of child care. [Laughter.] Labour Members may scoff, but they must understand that incentives will be provided for those whose children are currently cared for by nannies, grannies or other relatives to buy child care at the state's expense, and that must be an undesirable outcome. The proposals, together with the cut in the married couple's allowance, show that the Budget is not especially a Budget for the family.

The proposals are meant to provide work incentives and encourage people back into the labour market, but the Labour party has not even begun to deal with the critical question of what is the chief determinant in creating jobs. Mr. Kaletsky in The Times pointed out that the true determinant is economic growth, not packages and tax incentives of the kind set out under the welfare proposals.

The Budget also fails the test of proper macro-economic management that delivers stable economic growth, which is the real determinant of jobs. The fact that the Chancellor departed from the long-established convention of opening the Budget statement with a proper detailed analysis of the macroeconomic environment and outlook was telling. He skated over the issue, and the reason is no surprise: he did not dare to address the issues of the high pound and high interest rates.

Nothing in the Budget does anything to address those two central problems for the real economy. It is no coincidence that the high pound is going even higher. As speculators fear an interest rate rise on the back of the Budget, they are buying sterling and pushing up its value. The Budget has failed in that respect, too.

Labour Members always ask what we would have done differently, to ensure that the pound and interest rates were not so high. I am happy to tell them. The bad economic management since 1 May has destroyed the golden economic legacy, primarily through the transfer of control of monetary policy to the Governor of the Bank of England. Under a Conservative Administration, there would not have been a Monetary Policy Committee packed with people who do not understand monetary conditions or the real economy.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Bolton, West (Ms Kelly) is not in her place. She would certainly have joined us in calling for confirmatory hearings for nominees to the Monetary Policy Committee, as then we might have had a bit of common sense on that body. The net result of mismanagement since 1 May and the Budget proposals is that we face a recession. All the serious commentators say that there is a serious risk.

The Red Book shows us why. Consumer spending is set to fall, with the tax burden rising, the balance of payments surplus turning to deficit and the savings ratio falling. I remind Labour Members to look at page 116 of the Red Book. They will discover—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I call Mr. David Drew.

8.16 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Ms Kelly) referred to this as a radical Budget, and I am only too happy to concur, except that I would add that it remains within a well-rehearsed set of themes announced on numerous occasions by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. I want to re-rehearse those themes quickly, to set the context, before coming to the substance of my speech.

The themes are stability, with low inflation; fiscal rectitude; ending boom and bust; reducing our indebtedness; fairness, the centrepiece of which is the welfare-to-work strategy, with the evolution of a national anti-poverty strategy now locked in place; help for business, with increased transparency and clarity in the way in which we shall offer help, and a taxation structure that adds to the benefits of long-term investment and rewards entrepreneurship as well as giving specific help and advice; and, last, but not by any stretch of the imagination least, a concentration on the rebuilding and, indeed, enhancement of public services.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security gave us a sense of the excitement of our getting to grips with a proper, integrated national child care strategy. That has been universally welcomed by the child care organisations.

I want to discuss the implications for child care in rural and semi-rural areas. I was interested to hear the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) calling the proposals the nationalisation of child care. They are anything but that, because they allow flexibility in rural and semi-rural areas, where there is little competition or even a monopoly of care. Women in particular, and parents in general, need to know that their children are in safe hands. That can be assured only if there is quality child care provision, with genuine investment and appropriate regulation. I am pleased to see that that is a key part of the Government's proposal, from which rural areas stand to gain as much as urban areas.

I shall restrict my remarks to two of the Opposition's lines of attack. The first concerns their environmental allegations in regard to the petrol tax escalator. I remind the Conservatives that they initiated the petrol tax escalator when they once claimed to have environmental credentials. The Conservatives' torch logo is appropriate, as it sums up how out of touch they are with the environment. Perhaps the colour of that logo should change from blue to brown, as the Conservatives have no credibility left on the environmental front.

We welcome the fact that the Government are trying to do something about one of the most damaging pollutants and prevent the depletion of the quality of our environment. It is tough, and we must rely on a carrot-and-stick approach. We must talk to our constituents and rationalise: we must explain that they cannot have it both ways. However, I believe that people are genuinely beginning to get the message; they are realising that they will not see an improvement in the environment if they continue to use their cars whenever they want.

I served on the Committee that examined the Road Traffic Reduction (United Kingdom Targets) Bill, and the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope), did his best to filibuster and block that legislation. The Opposition should understand that people want to see those measures put into effect at the earliest opportunity. They are prepared to make sacrifices so long as there is a reward. We can provide that in the form of the carrot, by rebuilding our public services, including our bus and rail services. That will not be easy; the Budget has made a start, but we must go further.

[Mr. David Drew]

The Budget contains other measures that affect the environment. My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson) talked at considerable length yesterday about the reduction in value added tax on the installation of home insulation materials, so I shall not go over the same ground. The Government have increased landfill tax, and we have pledged to examine other difficult issues. For example, we shall consult about the impact of a carbon tax on business, industry and commerce. We shall consider how we can introduce a sensible environmentally sensitive tax regime that is both fair and comprehensive.

We must recognise that we are moving inexorably towards some form of green taxation. Although Labour Members welcome that, we do not wish to put the Chancellor of the Exchequer in an impossible position: we must take the nation with us. However, there is a clear demand for such taxation, as people know that the alternative is worsening health, the depletion of resources and an increase in pollution and associated dangers for them and their children.

The Opposition's second line of attack stems directly from their petrol tax accusations. It concerns principally the people who live in rural areas, of whom I am one. I am proud to represent the constituency of Stroud. We must appreciate that the rural economy is extremely complex and does not rely simply on the motor car—although that is an important feature of rural life. One must ask why Conservative Members did not argue against all the previous increases in petrol tax. They did not recognise the impact of that tax in terms of poverty, loss of services and the fact that people could not travel to find work.

We shall address those issues. We must find other means of enabling people to get to work—or, more particularly, we must provide work in rural areas. I am pleased to see that teleworking is a fast-growing industry. There are some dangers in that field in terms of low pay and poor conditions, but people may choose the type of work they do, when to work and when to be with their children. Teleworking provides tremendous opportunities and people do not have to use their cars to travel to work. That is one way of addressing a very difficult problem.

My remarks have been sparked partly by the speech last night of the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown)—who is near me geographically, if not politically. He launched a full-frontal attack on what he considered to be the Government's failure to assist public services in the county of Gloucestershire. That is total and absolute gall on his part. Although it is only a start, we have begun to turn around education in Gloucestershire this year. All our schools have received a budget increase of between 1 and 2 per cent. That is not a huge amount, but it is better than cut after cut, which head teachers grew used to under the previous Government. They are now much more confident that the present regime understands what the schools want and will finance them properly.

The hon. Gentleman's attack on health and bed blocking in my authority was also totally unjustified, because we are dealing with problems caused by the previous Conservative Government. It is totally unjust to claim that we do not care about public services. We will rebuild public services and we shall see this country into the next century with the quality services that it deserves.

8.26 pm

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): There are many elements in the Budget that I welcome warmly. I shall touch on three of them before moving on to what I consider to be an important omission.

The first measure that I welcome particularly—I have argued for it for many years—is the sensible reform employer national insurance contributions. It has always seemed anomalous that, when employee contributions were more or less sorted out, the previous Conservative Government did nothing about employer contributions and allowed the entry fee and the absurd tiered structure to remain.

This Government sensibly produced a pre-Budget consultation document, to which the Liberal Democrats responded. In our response, we argue that employer national insurance should be restructured, perhaps with a uniform rate above the lower earnings limit. Except for the fact that the Government have raised the lower earnings limit, they have done precisely as we recommended. We warmly welcome the move, which we regard as a sign of a responsive Government. We are grateful for that.

Secondly, we welcome the closer alignment between income tax and national insurance contributions, by merging the Contributions Agency with the Inland Revenue and aligning thresholds. We wonder whether that presages an eventual integration. I shall be interested to hear from the Paymaster General whether the Government have decided that the contributory principle has a future and that those basically direct taxes will eventually be merged. I hope for a response to that question, but I do not expect one.

The third element of the Budget that I welcome sincerely is additional money for the poorest children. I welcome very much the provision of extra money on the rates of child premiums for income support, for children under 11. It is sensible that that measure focuses on younger children who have the greatest need. However, I part company with the Chancellor on one point. He said:

> "The case for additional support for children in poorer families is strong, but that support should be on the basis of the identifiable needs of children, not on whether there happens to be one parent rather than two."—[Official Report, 17 March 1998; Vol. 308, c. 1107.]

The evidence is clear that one-parent families on income support are much poorer than two-parent families on income support. When measured by all the yardsticks of deprivation—such as durables, debt and all the things that affect quality of life—lone parents on income support are poorer than two-parent families on income support, and therefore require extra, rather than the same, help. We welcome additional money for all poor families on income support, but, on the Chancellor's own argument that support should be on the basis of the identified needs of children, lone parents continue to have a case for additional money.

As I said in an intervention during the Secretary of State's speech, it is regrettable that, in 1998–99, we have the anomaly that new lone parents will face the cut that was so controversial, whereas in 1999 all families with children will, essentially, get the money back.

It is a particular misfortune to become a lone parent in 1998–99 and to have to get by for a year without that £5 of family premium. It would cost the Government relatively little, even at this stage, to defer that cut. One element of that cut is still before the other place, and I hope that the Government will take the opportunity to defer it. Then we shall really believe that they are concerned about all poor children in poor families.

I welcome much of the Budget, but there is one important omission, which is housing costs. The words "rent" and "housing costs" do not appear in the Budget. Yet an important table on page 36 of the Government's first consultation document issued last July, "The Modernisation of Britain's Tax and Benefit System", lists the aspects which, according to research commissioned by the Department of Social Security, are barriers to people leaving benefit. The cost of child care is on the list, but in sixth position. After wage worries, second and third on the list come fears about losing help with council tax and with housing costs—mortgages and rents. That has been clearly identified by DSS research as stopping people on benefit moving off benefit into work. Regrettably, there was nothing in the Budget for that cause.

The working families tax credit with extra cash will help to some extent, but as soon as a person with a mortgage of £100 a week, which is not implausible, works 16 hours a week, he will have to find all that money from his net pay, quite apart from child care and all the other costs. That is a huge disincentive, which the Government have not even shown signs of reviewing.

The Government are reviewing housing benefit, which we welcome. During the past 10 years, rents have shot up hugely more than inflation and, like mortgages, rents are a huge burden on the low-paid. I should like to see—I speak in a personal capacity—social rents, and private rents for that matter, brought down. That is a slightly old-fashioned notion, but, as most people in the local authority and social rent sector are on low incomes, cutting rents would be a well-targeted universal subsidy. Universal subsidies are not as popular as they were, but, from a welfare-to-work point of view, it is much more effective to give people lower rents and enable them to obtain work, than for them to have high rents that they cannot afford when they take jobs.

To summarise, there are many welcome things in the Budget, but one important omission is the treatment of housing costs—rents and mortgages. It is regrettable that the matter was not considered in the round. The Budget measures on welfare to work—the working families tax credit, and so on—were not integrated with housing. The minimum wage will help, as will lower starting rates of tax or a higher allowance, the tax credits and the national insurance reforms, but everything should be taken together. Let us bring in housing costs. Let us not suffer from departmentalitis, whereby, because a matter comes under another Department, it is considered separately six months later. Let us include housing and have a comprehensive response to the problems of the low-paid. I shall then be able to welcome the Budget even more whole-heartedly than I already do.

8.32 pm

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North): I, too, welcome the Budget, particularly its emphasis on making work pay, the steps that it has taken to reform the appalling anomalies within the welfare state that we have inherited, its support for families and its new help with child care, the new investment for public services, particularly schools and hospitals, and the various measures that will support small businesses and job creation.

Those measures will be welcomed by my constituents in Bury. For too many years, thousands of them have suffered from chronic levels of low pay, from too little full-time work and too much part-time work, and from the absence of child care. The increase in child benefit will be appreciated by the 27,000 families in my constituency, particularly as one in nine are lone-parent families.

My local authority in Bury has one of the lowest levels of per capita funding for children in primary and secondary schools of any local authority in Britain. Therefore, the new investment in schools will be particularly welcome. Equally, our hospital has one of the lowest levels of per capita funding of any hospital trust in Britain. The new money for reducing waiting lists will be significant.

The Budget is in marked contrast to the successive Budgets of the Tory years, which served simply to reinforce inequality, progressively to disfranchise more and more families and young people, and to exclude increasing numbers of people from mainstream society. I am proud that my Government, through the Budget and the new deal, are starting to rebuild hope for the next generation, whereas the previous generation saw nothing but exclusion and the progressive eradication of its opportunities.

The significant changes to national insurance, the introduction of the working families tax credit and the tax credits for child care will help to transform the lives of many of my constituents, particularly women who are struggling to combine work and child care, or women who have been excluded from the labour market for too many years simply because of the limited availability of child care.

Within my general welcome for the Budget, I wish to raise one or two specific points, which I should be grateful if my hon. Friend the Paymaster General could mention when he replies.

First, I have to agree with one or two Conservative Members about the unfortunate absence of any reference to pensioners, either in the Chancellor's speech on Tuesday or in the Budget report. We understand and welcome the important help with fuel costs that was given to pensioners before Christmas, and we know that the pensions review will be published in the first half of this year. Clearly, this is not the time to make major changes to the pension system. Nevertheless, it would have given some hope, confidence and comfort to the nation's pensioners had there been some reference to them, even a simple one to the forthcoming review, in Tuesday's speech or in the Budget report.

With regard to lone-parent families, I understand the Government's point about separating out the issue of need and the issue of family structure, saying that need, not family structure, should be the basis of public support. I have tried hard to agree with that, but I simply cannot accept that the needs of a two-earner family paying the higher rate of income tax are equal to those of a lone-parent family. I cannot believe that the difficulties of bringing up and caring for children are the same for two parents as for one. I welcome the fact that the Government have responded to the previous changes in the Social Security Bill last December. Most lone parents will be pleased with the measures announced in the Budget, but, in line with the comments of the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb), I appeal to the Government to keep under review the question of need and lone-parent families.

[Mr. David Chaytor]

Similarly, I welcome the fact that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has flagged up the future status of child benefit in terms of taxation. But, again, I simply cannot justify that the child benefit received by two-earner families, paying the highest rate of income tax, should not be subject to tax, yet the lone-parent benefit was taken away last December. I hope that if it is finally decided that child benefit should be subject to taxation, the revenue from that taxation will be earmarked for further help for the poorest families in Britain, many of whom will be lone-parent families.

Another important technical point concerns the merger of the Inland Revenue and the Contributions Agency. That is one of the most profoundly important measures in the Budget because of the changes that it flags up to the future financing of the welfare state. I hope that there will be a lively debate on the continuation of the contributory principle under a merged bureaucracy. I also hope that, whatever happens to the contributory principle, it concentrates our collective mind on the harmonisation of tax and national insurance rates and thresholds and, in particular, flags up the enormous anomaly of the national insurance threshold. I appeal to hon. Members to ask themselves how they can justify the fact that, above £22,000—or thereabouts—a year, one stops paying national insurance? That is one of the most regressive features of our tax system, and, sooner or later, a Government will have to address it.

My major point concerns environmental taxation, about which my hon. Friends the Members for Stroud (Mr. Drew) and for Peterborough (Mrs. Brinton) have already spoken. I add my voice in support of the green tax measures in the Budget, particularly the increase in landfill tax, the cut in VAT on energy-saving materials and the various changes to road fuel duty and vehicle excise duty. Those measures are important and positive, but are comparatively limited in terms of their effect on greenhouse gases or traffic reduction.

To meet our Kyoto targets, there is scope for other measures, such as taxing employers' car parking spaces; urban road pricing; heavier taxation on dirty and fuel-inefficient vehicles, and taxing out-of-town retail parking spaces. I look forward to the forthcoming White Paper on the integrated transport strategy, which will, I am sure, deal with some of those points.

I particularly welcome the Chancellor's decision to investigate industrial and commercial energy taxation. It is critical that we carry industry and commerce with us in moving towards green taxation, and to demonstrate the value of green taxes, not only the cost savings to business, but the potential for growth in energy efficiency and environmental technologies. I look forward to other developments such as, for example, water pollution charges, following the recent Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions consultation paper.

Not only does green taxation help to conserve the natural resources on which our future health and prosperity depend, but, in the main, green taxes are cheap and easy to collect. They are difficult to avoid and serve to legitimise the whole concept of taxation. That legitimisation is sorely needed following the disastrous record of the previous Government in encouraging tax evasion and introducing taxes that were widely considered unfair and inefficient.

Most important, as we have seen already, green taxes enable the Government to cut taxes in other areas, most notably labour and wealth creation. That is already happening under our Government. It started to happen under the previous Government, and it is happening across Europe. It needs to be extended further as part of a general policy of shifting the burden of taxation away from goods and processes that are intrinsically good and towards those that are intrinsically bad.

I welcome the achievements on green taxation so far, but there is much further to go. I draw the House's attention to two documents published recently. The report of the Environmental Audit Select Committee contains a wealth of evidence from different sources on the state of green taxation. It rehearses most of the arguments in favour of green taxation. I hope that, over the next few months, the Government will take careful note of it when framing the 1999 Budget. I urge all hon. Members who have an interest in this issue to give their support to early-day motion 1108, which relates to the—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. Time is up.

8.43 pm

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): I am profoundly grateful to be able to speak while our Whips have vanished from the scene, as—perhaps unusually for an Opposition Member—I think that some aspects of the Budget are admirable. It is an immensely tough Budget in terms of the fiscal balance that it establishes. In fact, it outdoes most Conservative Chancellors in that respect. Other aspects that should be welcomed include the general principle of transferring from one form of benefit to a tax credit.

Alas, I do not think that the welcome for the Budget can be unreserved, as the transfer of taxation to the corporate sector, which will be discussed on Monday, will, I think—only time will tell—turn out to have been grossly misjudged and will contribute to what is already a far more severe recession in the manufacturing sector than the Treasury's models recognise. Throughout the past 25 years, the Treasury's models have been notoriously inaccurate in these respects.

I shall concentrate on a matter on which my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) began to elaborate. The Budget has a most important effect—one that I very much doubt that the Government intended. I am delighted to be able to speak about this in the presence of the Paymaster General, because, presumably, he was the Minister responsible for the most welcome U-turn. I presume that he was responsible for ensuring that individual savings accounts would not involve a retrospective breach of the trust of those who had engaged in tax-exempt special savings accounts and personal equity plans. If the Government were able to make that welcome U-turn, perhaps, under the Paymaster General's inspiration, they will be able in subsequent legislation—or even in the next few days, if one is to indulge in one's wildest dreams—to alter their position on the matter to which my hon. Friend referred.

I am speaking of something that is far more important to the children—at whom in great part, as many hon. Members on both sides of the House have referred, the Budget is aimed—than the money involved in the child care tax credit. Many issues were raised about the practicalities of the child care tax credit. The jury is out on that. We shall see what happens to mothers, to registrations, and whether it is used as a mechanism for simply increasing family income. If that happens, the predictions of the Institute for Fiscal Studies may come true, and there may be a £3 billion or £4 billion cost, as opposed to the £1 billion asserted by the Treasury.

Be that as it may, I regret to say that the child care tax credit is just a matter of money. How could I possibly say that anything is just a matter of money in relation to a Budget? This Budget intends to have—and does have—profound social effects. It is intended to create incentives, one of which I warmly welcome—the incentive for people to work. If the Chancellor were asked for his proudest achievement of the Budget, he would presumably tell us that it was to create a greater incentive to work. That admits immediately that the Budget's main point is its social effects and the effects on social incentives. If that is the case, it is not the money with which we should be most concerned but the social effect.

Anybody on the Conservative Benches has to admit that, until the last day of the previous Administration, the Conservative Government—much more out of oversight than intention—gradually tilted the balance, I regret to say, against marriage. Many of us, including my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green, preached against this throughout the time of the previous Government and regret it. However, that is not a reason for the present Government to repeat and amplify the mistake that we made. Any hon. Member who has children will agree that the sad truth is that the most important thing—above money and poverty—for children is how they live in their family.

I do not wish to moralise about this. It is a dreadful error for politicians to moralise. Perhaps we on the Conservative Benches stand convicted from time to time of having moralised too much. If the Chancellor genuinely believes—I think that he does—that his Budget is intended to achieve social effects, he must believe that it is right for the tax system to be viewed from the point of view of the social effects that it is likely to have. That means that the Government have to make a conscious choice about the society that they are trying to tilt towards through the tax system. If that is the case, it is undeniable that the Budget quite specifically militates against marriage.

It is no part of my purpose to argue in religious or moral terms for the institution of marriage. My argument is a practical one. It is about children. There is ample evidence—I do not think that the Secretary of State for Social Security would deny this, as her Department has evidenced this in its own work, and the Select Committee has reiterated it over many years—that, by and large, children prosper more when marriages stick together. It has been shown over many decades that although the divorce rate is alarmingly high, marriage is a better means of keeping parents together than any known human institution.

A Budget that starts from a series of mistakes made by a previous Government—perhaps from mistakes made over the previous 100 years—allied to social trends that have gradually undermined marriage, and that unnecessarily amplifies those mistakes for a small gain of roughly £1 billion by reducing the married allowance, and further amplifies them by making it easier for people to enter partnerships and still enjoy reasonable incomes for their children, unconsciously and unintentionally does gross damage to the structure of our society. If I am right that that is not what the Government intend, it can be easily remedied at little cost. If I am wrong, however, and that is part of the Government's intention, they should say so—and 30 million, 40 million or 50 million would howl them down.

There has been a tremendous reaction against ideas that were prevalent in the 1950s and 1960 that suggested that there was no difference between partnerships that stuck together and those that did not—hence, between partnership and marriage. That is a dated idea, because the modern view—the Labour party much prides itself on speaking about modernity—is that marriage is a glue that sticks society together, holds families together and helps children.

The Minister should admit either that the effect to which I have referred is not what the Government intended and that they will reverse it, or that it is what they intended and try to make an argument for what most hon. Members, even in this thinly populated Chamber, would find difficult to defend.

Mr. Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford): All hon. Members would agree that the remarks of the hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) about marriage and children were sincere. Having spent 10 years in social work, I agree that children prosper if families remain together. It is regrettable when parents split up because it has a detrimental effect, but for families on low incomes the pressures and strains of having insufficient resources to pay their way add to discord between couples and ultimately may lead to a marriage or relationship breaking up.

One of the positive measures in the Budget is the working families tax credit, which provides child care support for families.

I wish to focus on three areas—the main welfare to work and social security measures and two related issues. In my 10 years in community and social work, I endeavoured to assist people living in poverty and disadvantage to achieve change. Indeed, that is why I entered politics and joined the Labour party. I welcome and applaud the Budget. It provides essential solutions to tackling deprivation, and it will enhance the lives and opportunities of many people and families.

The new deal was introduced last July. Its proposals have been met with considerable enthusiasm in my constituency, especially among employers and young people. We recently launched the Medway towns new deal in the House, at which I was pleased to see the chairman of Gillingham football club. The Budget's proposals are the next crucial step after the new deal in helping to tackle poverty. The key test for the Labour Government is to turn back the tide of poverty that has crept over the country in the past 18 years.

Being on benefit should not mean that someone must live in poverty. My hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) referred to pensioners, many of whom live in poverty. That is particularly true of those who served in the war, who now have only a couple of ha'pennies to rub together. That is an indictment of us all. I was pleased to hear my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State reiterate that not everyone will be able to work and take advantage of the Budget's proposals. People with disabilities should not feel guilty about being on benefit; they should be secure in the knowledge that we value them as equals.

Being trapped on benefit is a real existence for many people, and in my previous work I saw the manifestations of that, which were eloquently described by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney). In constituencies such as mine, in which unemployment is about 5 per cent., there are pockets of unemployment where the rate is twice as high, and that has applied for far too long. As economic prospects improve for the majority, little seems to change for such people.

I recently attended a business breakfast, at which we were again launching the new deal. An employer said, "To tackle deprivation, surely all we must ensure is that the economy continues to improve." That is right, but if everyone is to benefit, especially those communities about which I am speaking, the necessary structures must be put in place, which is what the Budget aims to do.

It is not simple to get people back to work: a number of measures must be used. Shaming people and telling them to get on their bikes, which we heard many years ago, will not work. That only alienates people and defeats the desired objective.

We must also have a change of culture. It is hardly surprising that young people from the second or third generations of a family that has not experienced work have little aspiration other than the dole queue. I recently travelled to London on the train and spoke to two 18-year-olds from my area who had no expectation other than benefit. Indeed, they were surprised that I felt that they should be looking for an alternative life style. Perversely, they argued, albeit wrongly, that they were better off on benefits.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North eloquently stated that, tragically, many families are better off on benefit. The communities on the estate where those 18-year-olds live have been increasingly excluded and deprived. Many parents on such estates feel that they have not been able to offer themselves as a role model because they have been unable to work. I do not condemn them, but we must provide opportunities for parents so that as their children grow up they see that the aspiration to, and expectation of, work are the norm and do not say when they are 18, "We're better off on benefit."

The Budget's tax and benefit proposals will enormously assist low-income families and those on benefits and will effect the change in culture that I have described and provide opportunities.

The current family credit system has many faults, and there is a stigma attached to it. People have to fill in reams of paper when applying for it, and there is an unsatisfactory take-up rate. People generally prefer not to be in receipt of welfare benefits. The Chancellor's proposals will give more cash help to 400,000 families and will break the benefits link, as the credit can be paid through a wage. That is a far more dignified way of assisting low-income families. I look forward to hearing whether it will be paid through the purse or the wallet.

Child minders and nurseries were part of my responsibilities when I worked in social services. There are many unregistered, and therefore illegal, child minders. They do not necessarily have a wanton desire to flout the law and put children at risk: they are neighbours and friends, particularly in poorer communities, who act together to support one another. There is a massive shortage of good-quality child care. The working families tax credit, coupled with the improved child benefit, will allow parents to work and will be an income and a regenerator for poorer communities, because money spent on child care will remain within those communities. I welcome the debate on who should receive child benefit and who should be taxed on it.

Another 50,000 child minders are required. That would put further pressure on local authorities' registration and inspection units.

9.1 pm

Mr. Robert Walter (North Dorset): I shall take a different approach from other hon. Members, although my right hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) referred to the matter that I shall raise. The Budget is very unfriendly to those who live outside urban Britain. It is an attack on the countryside, and shows Labour's lack of understanding of rural issues and rural problems. My argument has nothing to do with country sports: it is about the people who live and work in rural Britain.

Britain's hard-hit farmers were left stunned by a Budget that offered them little or no comfort. I declare an interest as a farmer. The Budget did nothing to tackle the overall impact of the strong pound on agriculture and although the Chancellor acknowledged the problem, he did nothing to address it.

The deputy president of the National Farmers Union, Mr. Tim Bennett, said:

> "Agriculture continues to be one of the worst hit industries affected by the strength of sterling. It will bring little comfort to many struggling family farms whose incomes have been cut by a half on average last year."

Farmers remain seriously concerned about the strength of sterling, which is forcing up their costs and drawing in cheap imports, with catastrophic effects on market prices.

Farmers can draw little comfort from the Red Book. Under "Changes from previous plans" in the section on the public finances, it shows that spending by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food was down £140 million in 1997–98, and is down £50 million for 1998–99. Apart from the special circumstance in the Department for Education and Employment, they are among the largest reductions in spending plans.

Hon. Members may think that the changes to capital gains tax have little to do with farming. The retirement relief on capital gains tax is to be phased out over five years from 6 April 1999. That is bad news for anyone who is contemplating retirement from farming after April 1999, as it is for the disposal of any smaller business.

The Chancellor has chosen not to synchronise the withdrawal of retirement relief with his reductions in the rate of capital gains tax.

The proposed changes will ultimately result in people being unable to retire because they will have to use their money differently. That is contrary to intentions announced in the House by the Minister of Agriculture, who is seeking European Union support for an early-retirement scheme. He is asking Brussels for money for early retirement, yet he is allowing the Chancellor of the Exchequer to remove one of the most advantageous early-retirement schemes available to farmers. Farmers who want to retire are not helped by the increases in stamp duty. It is not only large farms that are worth £250,000 or £500,000; they and smaller farms will now be affected by the 3 per cent. rate of stamp duty.

Farming, market gardening, forestry and timber production have been excluded from the new enterprise investment scheme and from the venture capital scheme.

The Chancellor announced with some glee that he was reducing the mainstream rate of corporation tax to 20 per cent. Most farmers do not run their farms as corporate bodies. Farmers are individuals, so their businesses will not benefit from the reduction, and they will still pay the 23 per cent. rate of income tax.

Labour Members have suggested that the increase in petrol tax is in line with increases introduced by the previous Government. We have had two increases in petrol duty in just 10 months, whereas the previous Government did not increase petrol tax twice a year.

Drivers in rural areas—mothers who take their children to school and those who drive to work out of necessity rather than by choice—will suffer immediately as a result of the increase in petrol prices.

The deputy president of the NFU said:

"Farmers will be heartened to hear the Chancellor acknowledge the need of rural communities—particularly with the announcement of a £50 million fund for rural transport—but they will be waiting to see that acknowledgement translated into tangible benefits."

Britain's rural parishes will have to bid for cash from this £50 million fund, which seems ridiculously small if it is to have a sensible effect. The Times suggested:

"If the three quarters of rural communities without any bus service at all share Gordon Brown's promised £50 million investment in rural transport they will end up with little more than a wheel nut each."

I contend that £50 million is not much spread across the country.

Let us take a typical couple with two children and a mortgage, living in one of the shire counties of rural Britain. Such a couple will be about £1,000 worse off as a result of the measures introduced by the Government in two Budgets. There are the increases in petrol duty, which I have already mentioned; there are the increases in mortgage interest rates, which, as we know, result from high interest rates that led to a rise in the value of sterling; and, of course, there are the increases in council tax, which in my county amount to a minimum of 12 per cent. in any district year on year. That represents an 11 per cent. decline in the disposable income of the typical couple whom I have cited.

The Government have demonstrated their insensitivity to the needs of rural Britain. They have hit rural industry, especially agriculture. In the first year of the current Administration, agriculture has become £2 billion worse off, and the Budget has done nothing to redress that. In fact, in many of our rural industries and communities, it has made the position much worse.

9.9 pm

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): There is more to the Budget than meets the eye in regard to tax increases, and significantly less than meets the eye in regard to the Government's stated objectives. First, let me say something about the handwritten contract with the people that the Labour leader drafted with his very own hand during the election campaign. The first clause of that contract said that a Labour Government would spend the money that had been used to deal with the cost of economic and social failure on education. In other words, Labour would reform the welfare state, and would use the resulting savings to boost education.

Let us see how Labour is doing in that regard. At the end of February, the Minister for Welfare Reform appeared before the Select Committee on Social Security. When asked how much he expected to be saved from the social security budget during the lifetime of the current Parliament, he said that he wished "to slow the rate of increase in social security spending."

There were no plans to reduce spending, no plans to make savings and no plans to plough cash from social security into education. That was a clear breach of the first clause of Labour's so-called contract with the people.

The objective of halting the rate of increase in social security spending had already been achieved by my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), but it is clear from the Budget that even that objective has now been abandoned. According to the Red Book, the working families tax credit will cost £420 million more than family credit in its first six months of operation, and £1.3 billion in its first full year. On top of that there is the increased child benefit and child-care tax credit, involving a total cost of £1.2 billion a year. There will be no savings in the social security budget under the present Government. There is a breach of the first clause of the contract with the people, and there is a gaping hole in Labour's tax and spending plans.

Let us cast our minds back to the economic package that Labour presented to the electorate. Apart from the windfall tax, Labour's spending programme involved no requirement to raise taxes; all its promises of increased spending on education and health could be funded by existing budgets—through efficiencies and, most significantly, savings in the social security budget. The Labour party said—and still says—that it would reduce the dependency culture, and would get people off welfare.

Let us consider the Government's objective, which will again demonstrate that there is less in the Budget than meets the eye. The introduction of the working families tax credit is clearly well intentioned, but family credit has been a very successful benefit. There has been an 82 per cent. take-up rate on the basis of expenditure. It clearly helps not only low-income couples but single parents to go to work. We have yet to be told why family credit needed to be replaced, other than the fact that it was introduced by the Conservatives.

The problem with the working families tax credits and childcare tax credits is the enormous increase in the number of people eligible for the benefit higher up the income scale. There has always been a big problem with changing tapering rates: as incomes rise, people begin to lose benefit. Inevitably, in any benefit system, coming off benefit will involve high withdrawal rates. The difficulty is that making withdrawal rates less steep will mean extending the tapers higher up the income scale, making more people eligible for benefit.

The purpose of lowering tapering rates is to provide more incentives to get people off benefits and into work. As a result, others are often given increased incentives to reduce work and claim benefits. That is precisely what the Government admit would be a consequence of the working families tax credit and the reduced taper of 55 per cent. The notorious table 3.3 in the Red Book points out that 250,000 more people will face withdrawal rates of 60 per cent. or more as a result of the Budget. The second objective—to reduce the dependency culture—has clearly not been met.

When the childcare tax credit is included, the increased dependency culture becomes worse. It is clear that the availability of the new benefit goes right off the income scale. A family earning £22,000 a year with one child will be able to claim the credit. That income is just above the national average. How can we reduce dependency if we give new income-related benefits to households on above-average income?

The position is worse still. A family with two children will be able to claim the benefit with an income of up to £30,000 a year, significantly higher than the average income. It is absurd to claim, as the Government do, that the benefit will cost only £1 billion a year. That figure is clearly nonsense, as even a quick glance at the examples in the separate book on the working families tax credit will show.

Example four is of a family earning £23,400, who will be able to claim £45 a week child care tax credit. That is more than £2,300 a year and most claimants will be able to receive more. Clearly, £1 billion is an underestimate. The Institute for Fiscal Studies agrees. It estimates that the cost will be some £4 billion if everyone who is entitled to the credit takes it up.

Much of the Budget is about putting right some of the many catastrophic and ill-thought-through measures in the Government's first Budget last July. The hubris with which the dynamic new Chancellor launched his July Budget has been matched only by the humiliation that the Government, and the Paymaster General in particular, have faced since that Budget. A host of new measures have been required to put matters right.

Ending the repayment of tax credits led to the abolition of foreign income dividends, which meant having to abolish advance corporation tax and to introduce a new method of paying corporation tax which, even with the changes, still places an enormous cash flow burden on British industry over the next four years. Those measures combined will cost companies £20 billion over that time—money which would otherwise have been available for investment.

Labour was elected on the clear understanding that it had no plans to increase tax. There is an abundance of quotes to prove that. Before the election, the Prime Minister said:

"We have no plans to increase tax at all".

In August 1996, he told the Daily Express:

"Our proposals do not involve raising taxes".

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said before the election—to the authoritative source of GMTV on 8 April 1997:

"There is no black hole for the Labour Party because we have got no public spending commitments that require extra taxes".

Ministers are trying retrospectively to rewrite that commitment. They say that they promised not to raise only the basic and higher rates of income tax. Just like a dishonest salesman pointing to the fine print of a contract, they say that the British electorate should have known that they would raise taxes and that the commitment was to do just with the rates, but my understanding was that there was a commitment not to raise tax and that the specific commitment on rates underlined that more general agreement and commitment. It did not narrow that general commitment. Why would people feel safe to vote Labour, with its track record of tax and spend, if they thought that the only commitment was not to raise rates and that Labour was free to implement a range of other tax increases, which would, in the same way, reduce take-home pay and spending power?

This Budget is the Government's second tax-raising Budget. As well as enormous tax hikes on business, income tax rises accompany the erosion of the married couples allowance, and there are enormous expenditure tax rises in the cost of petrol. The Government have now outrageously promised to raise taxes on child benefit.

The Budget has increased tax, spending and the dependency culture. By doing so, it has breached Labour's commitment not to increase tax, not to increase spending and to reduce the dependency culture. The Government's honeymoon enabled them to get away with the tax hikes in their previous Budget. It will not do so this time.

9.18 pm

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks): I declare the interests that are recorded in the Register of Members' Interests.

For the second day running, more people have been ready to attack the Budget than the Government have been able to marshal to defend it. The real test of the Budget is not the headlines that the Government have managed to engineer this week or the hype that preceded it, but whether unemployment falls as a result.

Rebadging family benefits, relaunching child care initiatives and rejigging national insurance contributions are all meaningless unless more people are working and fewer people are claiming benefit as a result. I hope that the Paymaster General will accept that. I challenge him to produce the figures from the Treasury—the estimated falls in unemployment as a result of the Budget for the coming financial year, next year and the first full year of the working families tax credit. If he cannot produce those figures tonight, that will tell us a story. It is no use having a Budget entitled "Making Work Pay" if there is no more work in the first place. Whether or not this Budget makes work pay is highly questionable. What is certain is that it does not make more work possible.

By contrast, our Budgets did just that. A whole series of Budgets, including those in which my right hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor), the former Chief Secretary to the Treasury, played such a notable part, helped to produce more work. They gave us the best record of job creation in Europe and brought about a flourishing new and small business sector.

The Government have already reversed that trend. Right from the start they have hammered job creation. They have put on business a huge new burden of corporation tax and have levied the new windfall tax. They have attacked pension funds and discouraged long-term investment. This Budget has added yet more taxes on business.

The changes in national insurance contributions will hit high-skill companies. As my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) elegantly said, the increases in stamp duty will damage businesses involved in commercial property or asset sales. There are other tax hits, notably on the insurance industry, and the full impact of others is only just coming to light. Next year, business will face the impact of the national minimum wage on wage differentials right up the pay scale. It will also face the first new costs of the social chapter legislation.

All that is worsened by the Government's callous disregard for the effect of the high pound on industry. Indeed, they encouraged the current level of sterling. By taxing pensions and hitting savings, the Government have fuelled consumption and brought about a two-speed economy. They would have done better to have genuinely acknowledged the pain now being felt right across British manufacturing industry. We did not hear much concern from the Chancellor on Tuesday. Indeed, in the section on risk assessment in the Red Book we find the chilling idea that, if the Government are wrong in some of their forecasts

"monetary policy would probably be behind the game."

This is not a game for manufacturing industry.

I warn the Government now that the Budget will further unbalance the economy and may well push manufacturing industry into recession. If it does so, it will be a recession entirely of the Government's making. It will be the Brown recession. We have a Budget that puts up taxes, puts up the cost of business and fudges welfare reform.

I should like now to deal with some of the detailed points that have been made by hon. Members on both sides of the House. I begin with a glaring omission from the Budget statement and, indeed, from the Red Book which the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor)—in an extremely elegant and well-argued speech—picked out: there is nothing in the Budget for pensioners. In the entire Red Book, only six lines are addressed to pensioners, and three of those simply repeat the announcement made in the pre-Budget report. Pensioners are the forgotten people in the Budget.

We should also not forget that pensioners use petrol, and that pensioners will be paying more in fuel tax. Pensioners pay council tax, and they will now be paying more council tax. Pensioners have been ignored in the Budget.

Pension schemes seem to have been further disregarded by the Government. The Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) has wisely left the Chamber. He was present, last week, at a dinner at which the chairman of the Association of Actuaries said:

"Significantly, employers' confidence in the stability of the pensions tax regime has been dented. I must warn the Government that further tax changes which are made without consultation will do even greater damage to the confidence and willingness of employers to provide pension schemes—particularly small employers."

So pensioners have been damaged by the Budget.

My hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) touched on the savings issue, which was not simply an example of the Government bungling yet another scheme—although Ministers have had, of course, to back down on their retrospective and penal attempt to restrict to £50,000 the savings of those who have scrimped and saved for 10 years now. We can note other features of the Government's handling of the matter.

First, we have had no apology from the Government, in withdrawing that proposal, for the damage that they have done to confidence in public and national schemes.

Secondly, we still have a new lower limit. Although it is true that the limit is not £50,000, will the Paymaster General confirm that the current annual limit of £10,800, taking personal equity plans and tax-exempt special savings accounts together, will be reduced to £5,000?

Above all, we know from the bungling of the savings scheme Labour's true instinct. Labour did want to tax those who have worked hard and saved hard. Today, I should like the Paymaster General to tell the House what type of assurance he can give—on even his own individual savings account scheme—that the Government will not come back again, in a few years, to penalise exactly that type of tax-free exemption.

It is becoming apparent in the technical press that the changes to capital gains tax have not been universally welcomed. Given low inflation, many people would have been better off under indexation than they will be under the new lower rate.

Perhaps the Paymaster General will address himself to some of the problems—if I can call them that—that are emerging with his 30-day rule. The Government suggest that any capital gain will have to be made over 30 days rather than overnight. How will that apply—City advisers are asking—to married couples? What if the husband sells shares and the wife purchases them within 30 days? Will they still lose their exemption?

Will the various packages that are being mooted in the City allowing people to hedge against market movement in those 30 days be allowed or not?

I now turn to the working families tax credit, a proposal that was admirably dissected by my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) last night. Like the Institute of Fiscal Studies, we reserve judgment on whether it will be an incentive or a disincentive. As one of my hon. Friends said, the jury is still out on that question.

Perhaps the Paymaster General will clear up the shambolic performance of the Financial Secretary last night and clarify two or three key points. First, will women have a veto? If he does nothing else tonight, I hope that the Paymaster General will answer that specific question. It is no use saying that it is a matter for the partners to elect. We want to know whether, if the man is the main earner, the woman will have a veto. If she does, will the Government help to publicise it and make it clear so that women know where they stand?

Mr. Rendel: On that point, if the woman has a veto, what will it do to her marital relations if she tries to use it?

Mr. Fallon: Absolutely. That is the tangle that the Government are getting into. It is something that we need to know.

[Mr. Fallon]

Secondly, perhaps the Paymaster General could answer the question from my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies). If the working families tax credit is such a good idea, why are the self-employed exempt from it? Why does it not apply to them? The Secretary of State for Social Security was asked that six hours ago and she could not answer it because the Treasury has not told her yet. That is the Muppet show to which the Department of Social Security has been reduced. Not only is the Secretary of State unable to give us the answer, but she cannot express a view on whether or not it is right to extend the tax credit to those who are self-employed.

Thirdly—and this is a trickier question so perhaps the Paymaster General will be able to get his mind around it—how will the working families tax credit be classified in terms of expenditure? Let me quote from the Red Book:

"The net cost of WFTC is split between 'accounting adjustments' in GGE, and 'other receipts and accounting adjustments' in GGR . . . whether or not any or part of WFTC should score in the Control Total has not been decided."

Perhaps the Paymaster General can assist us on that point.

While we are on the subject of the Red Book, perhaps the Paymaster General can enlighten us on another matter. What has happened to the privatisation programme, which appears to have come to a grinding halt? Under the Conservative Government it was running at around £4 billion a year. In the current financial year, it brought in £2 billion from sales that we arranged. For 1998–99, it is forecast to raise £0 billion. We now learn from the Red Book that "The Government has not announced any specific sales for 1998–99 or subsequent years."

Is privatisation now off the agenda? What has happened to the sale of London Underground or the immediate review of the Post Office that was promised? What has happened to the "National Asset Register" that was launched in a great fanfare last November? Under the previous Government, asset sales were running at £3 billion or £4 billion a year. Why are they now forecast to come to an end?

Finally, perhaps I can turn to the much trailed code for fiscal stability. You will share my concern, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that the document entitled "Budget 98" was published the day before the Budget, and, worse still, was publicly launched in the newspapers. Let us be very clear. Only a Labour Government would need a code for fiscal stability, given the mess that we inherited in 1979. The code presented on Monday fails the test of seriousness required of any code.

The code is not in the "Budget 98" publication. There will merely be two clauses in the Finance Bill requiring the Chancellor to publish a code by next December. He has taken the power to modify the code if the Treasury requires that. The code is supposed to be binding on the Government, but they are allowed to modify it. The code will be limited to the relationship between taxation and expenditure; it will not cap taxation. It will not and cannot stop this Government continuing to increase the overall burden of taxation.

Yvette Cooper: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the previous Government doubled the national debt? Is that what he means by fiscal stability under the Conservatives?

Mr. Fallon: The hon. Lady knows that the national debt tends to rise in times of recession. We had it on track to descend without the additional tax increases that the Government have introduced.

Dr. Ladyman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fallon: No. I want to leave the Paymaster General plenty of time to grapple with my questions.

As we have the pleasure of the Paymaster General's company, perhaps we could subject the Budget to the Robinson test. At the Labour party conference last October, the Chancellor said:

"A Labour Chancellor will not permit tax reliefs to millionaires in offshore tax havens."

There was not much about offshore trusts in the July Budget. There is not much about them in the Red Book. We did not hear a great deal about them on Tuesday.

Back in December, in an article that described him as a "deeply hurt Robinson", the Paymaster General said:

"Indeed, I could show you internal Treasury documents to show that I have been working against my own financial interests on this policy. You will be pleasantly surprised."

We doubted it then and we certainly doubt it now. The only changes proposed to offshore trusts affect those set up before March 1991 and those to be set up by non-domiciled settlers. Will the Paymaster General confirm that, after the changes, he will still be entitled to tax-free income from the dividends on the shares that are held offshore in a trust on his behalf? The man who wanted to cap everybody else's tax-free savings at £50,000 and who is now to limit them to £5,000 a year will still be entitled to keep his millions offshore, tax free.

The Budget fails the Robinson test. Indeed, it fails every test. It puts taxes up; it pushes industry further into recession; and it postpones serious welfare reform in a muddle of rebadging, brochures and public relations. The Budget fails the country and the Government in the intentions that they set before the electorate. For those reasons, we shall oppose it on Monday night.

The Paymaster General (Mr. Geoffrey Robinson): One point on which I can respond positively to the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) is that the ultimate test of this and all our Budgets—and all the measures that we intend progressively to introduce in a great programme of reform that Conservatives signally failed to undertake during their 18 years in office—will be the management of the economy and the stability that we are setting out to achieve. I therefore say right at the beginning of this winding-up speech that everything we have done since we took office in May has been done with achieving that stability in mind, very precisely to avoid all the errors of previous Governments—both Labour and Tory—that took the economy and the country through the inevitable cycle of stop-go and all that meant to individuals and companies caught up in it.

Such a cycle is the most damaging thing for small companies, to which many Conservative Members have paid tribute. It is the most damaging thing for families. It is the most damaging thing to the economy of the nation. That is why, on the very day we took office, the Bank of England was granted operational independence. That is why we set in hand a series of changes that, so far from being piecemeal, were successive parts of an overall plan to take the emphasis away from paying dividends in the corporate sector to investment and long-termism. That is why we abolished tax credits.

That is why the second, logically following Budget—unlike what the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) seems to think, the Budget was part of an overall plan—neatly dovetailed to accommodate what practically can be done. I shall come to some of the practical problems in which Conservative Members are seeking refuge. As they realise that the principles of reform, progressive reorganisation and welfare and the incentives to work are things with which they must agree, they seek to take refuge in a series of pettifogging details that we shall have plenty of time to sort out over the next 18 months before the changes are introduced.

In the context of long-termism, we turn to savings. We know the Conservative party's appalling record through the 1980s, when the country had the misfortune to have it in office. We had a negative saving ratio for five years on the trot in the mid to late 1980s.

Mr. Ruffley: What about what is in the Red Book?

Mr. Robinson: There is a long way to go before it becomes negative. The hon. Gentleman must realise that the forecasts are there, they are Conservative forecasts and they are in the Red Book. I am very well aware of them. Has he the slightest idea of the difference between the projection and the negative rate that the Conservative Government achieved for five successive years in the 1980s? They are not at all comparable.

Let us talk about the individual savings accounts programme and what has been said about it. The new savings plan has been widely welcomed by every product-producing institution in the City of London. It has been welcomed by the Association of British Travel Agents, by Marks and Spencer and by areas of the retail industry that are intending to introduce the cash ISA to reach the half of the population that did not save at all and was untouched by the Conservative Government's PEPs and TESSAs.

Conservatives complain when we publish a document on which we have decided to consult; the next moment they say that the results of consultation are not what they expected. We know what consultation meant when they were in government: it meant that they had made their minds up, would not listen to reason and would not respond to the points that were put to them. That, of course, is why in the end they suffered ignominious defeat at the hands of the electorate in May. We have listened; we are a Government who consult. That surely is another factor that emerges from the way in which we are approaching the whole budgetary process.

Let us take, for example, the industrial energy arrangements on which Sir Colin Marshall has agreed to lead an investigation for the Government. We have not rushed in with detailed, absolute proposals. On the contrary, we are proposing to consult and to listen to what is said in that consultation process. So it was with ISAs.

Mr. Hammond: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the confusion and uncertainty over the future of PEPs, TESSAs and ISAs has permanently damaged the saving ethic of the middle classes?

Mr. Robinson: That is the most ridiculous thing that has been said from the Conservative Benches all evening. The savings plan has been welcomed; we are confident that it will be a great success. I have had nothing but a welcome for the new proposals and a determination to see them fully taken up.

The hon. Member for Sevenoaks asked what we can say about the proposals for the new ISA in respect of the amounts and the duration of the tax relief arrangements. I can give him an assurance of the sort that has not been given by a Government before. He knows that it was an open secret in financial circles that the Tories themselves were planning a cap on the exponential growth of both TESSAs and PEPs, especially PEPs.

We are the first Government to have given a commitment covering 10 years, and that commitment puts in place the certainty that the savings community needs. Yes, we shall review the arrangements after seven years, but the commitment to 10 years is absolute. Yes, those savings will continue to enjoy at least the present levels of tax relief. Again, this is the first time that any Government have given that undertaking, and we do it precisely to avoid the sort of uncertainty that underlay PEPs and TESSAs. Conservative Members know that that is true.

Yes, we have said that the amounts that we envisage for the 10 years will remain as they are, and will not be reduced, although they may be reviewed. We have made that clear. Indeed, in the latter stages of the consultation—[Interruption.] They will not be reduced. If the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) does not understand what I am saying, I am sorry for him. It is a bit late in the evening, and we understand.

In the consultation period, it was put to us that to get the cash element of the new ISA, which was so important to us, off the ground, an increase in the first year, directed towards that cash element, would be welcome. We therefore made an increase for the first year—from £5,000 to £7,000—in the latter stages of the consultation, and it has all been extremely well received.

The hon. Member for Sevenoaks asked what we were doing about privatisation. I can tell him this: we shall not have any more of the rip-offs that the Conservative party allowed and we shall not have any more fat-cat millionaires—[HON. MEMBERS: "Like you."] We shall not. As Conservative Members have understood, the whole capital gains tax structure is geared towards those who undertake to make their business assets work hard to increase their capital gain. That is precisely the aim.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robinson: I shall—not that the hon. Gentleman has been heard much in the debate, but as it is him, I shall give way in a moment.

[Mr. Robinson]

There will be a statement tomorrow on the London underground and I advise hon. Members to attend. It will be most instructive for them to see what progress we are making, especially in avoiding the sort of traps that the Conservatives fell into. The hon. Member for Sevenoaks should take note of the arrangements that my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister will unveil.

A review of the Post Office, too, will shortly be announced, and the hon. Gentleman will see that we are also making progress there—progress on a balanced set of relationships between the public and the private, which avoids the Conservatives' mistakes.

Mr. Howarth: I am grateful to the Paymaster General for giving way to me, despite the fact that I have not been able to participate in the debate as much as I would have liked. He will not be allowed to get away with the assertion that the taxpayer did not get due value for money out of rail privatisation. The assets did not achieve a better market value because investors were put off by the Labour party's threats to take the assets back into national ownership.

Mr. Robinson: The hon. Gentleman will probably regret that intervention on reflection, but I am pleased that he made it because it enables me to clarify one point of distinction about rail privatisation that is worth making. I think that the Conservatives, slow and painful though the process was, came to learn the error of their ways in some respects, and their treatment of Railtrack avoided some of the worst aspects of their earlier privatisations. However, that did not stop the Tory Government making a hopeless mess of the rolling stock companies. Because of the definition that we used, ROSCOs were not drawn into the windfall tax, but there is every reason for thinking that they should have been. Even the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) cannot feel terribly proud of them, even on commercial terms, let alone in terms of the national interest.

We are pressed for time and I shall make progress as quickly as I can. The hon. Member for Sevenoaks said that there was nothing in the Red Book about the code for fiscal stability, which is an important element in our approach to the economy. Our approach is totally different from that of the Conservatives; it is long term and principled, unlike the short-termism that characterised the Conservative Government.

That short-termism led to our taking office with accelerating interest rates, because action was not taken—

Mr. Duncan Smith: What?

Mr. Robinson: Absolutely. Where has the hon. Gentleman been for the past four years? He must have been living somewhere else. It is an acknowledged fact that the previous Chancellor of the Exchequer refused, for purely electoral, party political reasons, to increase interest rates when he should have done, and that inflation was accelerating, which is why, on our second or third day in government, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor had to take steps.

Mr. Fallon: Will the Paymaster General give way?

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): Will the Paymaster General give way?

Mr. Robinson: I shall be delighted to give way in a moment. I should point out to Opposition Members—as they fight each other to clamber to the Dispatch Box—that the code for fiscal stability was published in November. If it escaped the attention of the hon. Member for Sevenoaks—who probably did not hold his present position on the Opposition Front Bench then—I shall arrange for him to receive a copy.

Mr. Fallon: If the Paymaster General is now happy with the level of interest rates, is he equally happy with the high value of sterling?

Mr. Robinson: The hon. Gentleman raises a fundamental question. Conservative Members may not like it, but they must realise that they got into a mess and produced the two biggest recessions in this country's economic management since the war. We have to go for stability—stability is vital to big and small businesses. Our exporters are having a tough time, but other countries have come through these periods. If we were to give in to short-term pressures at this stage—when we could go for long-term sustained stability and growth—we would be making precisely the same mistake as the Tories. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) must behave himself.

Mr. Robinson: I am grateful for your help, Mr. Deputy Speaker, although I have to say that I had not noticed the hon. Gentleman misbehaving. He was probably behaving normally.

Mr. Fallon: Will the Paymaster General give way?

Mr. Robinson: The hon. Gentleman must sit down. I have answered his question. If he does not understand it by now, he never will, and he is in for a long period of having to learn about economic management. The sooner he learns—for his own sake—the better. The Government are committed to a long-term stable economy that will avoid the stop-go policies that damaged so many businesses, put so many people into negative equity and broke so many hearts. Shadow spokesmen must learn; there is no short cut on this, and we intend to see it through.

Many right hon. and hon. Members have taken part in what has been a good debate. On the whole, it has been well attended. That is still the case. There has been a tendency for Conservative Members—with one notable exception—to say that the problem is that the detail of the administrative arrangements has yet to be put in place. The hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) made a series of points on that matter and I would not pretend to offer him a detailed answer tonight. If he reflects, he will agree that a major change of this kind is bound to impose a great strain on the administration of the affairs to which it relates. We cannot pretend that it will not cause problems, but the question each of us must answer is whether the reforms are principled and going in the right direction. Are they intended to get many people out of dependency and into work? Should they provide that incentive?

The Budget is essentially about children, mothers and families, and the hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) made a remarkable speech in that context. The family credit system was worked through a number of great teething difficulties and if our priorities and principles are right, the same will occur with these reforms. The support that we can expect from both sides of the House will be welcome.

The hon. Member for West Dorset spoke in the absence of Whips—they are present now. He was right to have the courage to say that he welcomed the Budget. He said that it was going in the right direction and that it was based on correct principles, even though he had doubts as to whether, in a certain respect—essentially the question of married couples and the institution of marriage—we had got it wrong. We thought about that long and hard. If circumstances have changed in a way he does not approve of, I understand, but Governments must deal with the reality of any given situation, and it was against that background that we took our decision.

My hon. Friends the Members for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney) and for Chatham and Aylesford (Mr. Shaw) have detailed personal experience of the problems associated with the less well-off in society. My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North instanced the perverse effects of the Conservative reforms on school meals and on child care. My hon. Friend the Member for Chatham and Aylesford spoke about two 18-year-olds whom he met on a train, both of whom had come to the conclusion that work did not make any sense for them and that they were better off on benefits. If that is the attitude—I think that that culture has been inculcated among far too many youngsters and the less well off—it is clear that we must do something about it.

To that end, we are proposing, as hon. Members on both sides of the House know, to introduce the working families tax credit, which is, I think, largely the reason for the fairly positive endorsement of the Budget by Liberal Democrats. The hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel), who speaks for the Liberal party on these matters, made a good contribution.

We also heard from the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), who speaks with the authority of the chairmanship of the Social Security Committee. We pay tribute to that Committee's work and I take this opportunity to thank Martin Taylor for the excellent service that he rendered the House in writing the initial report. The hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) posed particular questions to which I shall ensure he receives answers—as I shall for all hon. Members who have raised points of detail on which they would like us to reply.

The Liberal Democrat attitude shows both an attention to detail and a breadth of view. That was demonstrated when the hon. Member for Newbury said that he was particularly pleased that the personal allowance would be granted to women who are caring for disabled husbands. That change did not attract much attention, but it exemplifies the Budget's bias in favour of children, women and families, which marks a wholly new departure in social welfare reform as we move from a dependency culture to a system under which people are paid to work. People who want to work will have that opportunity and we want to ensure that the motivation for that is properly rewarded.

Mr. Ruffley: Conservative Members have consistently asked about the wallet versus purse argument in respect of working families tax credit, which is a big issue for many of our constituents. What is the Government's response to the basic criticism of their proposal?

Mr. Robinson: As the Conservative party continued to make child benefit payable to the mother, it clearly endorsed the policy that we have embedded into every measure that the Chancellor unveiled on Tuesday—we want the maximum amount to go to the children, who are at the centre, through the mother, so that families benefit. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that when we go into the details of how the tax credit will work and how we can achieve our objectives, that will be absolutely at the forefront of our concern. [Interruption.] Time is pressing, and the points made by a number of other hon. Members need replies—if I can find time, despite the sedentary interjections of the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green, I shall be pleased to answer them.

I entirely agree with what the hon. Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) said about deregulation. I ask her to reflect on the thought that what she proposed might entail much paperwork, as I fear is often the case at the centre of Government. Deregulation units do not always achieve exactly what they set out to do.

Mrs. Lait: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robinson: I really cannot—it is too late now. No doubt there will be other occasions on which we can discuss the matter, as well as the hon. Lady's personal experience in the exponentially growing business of smuggling—hers is a particular sphere of experience, but it was interesting to hear about.

In the last moments of this debate, I must mention the speeches of my hon. Friends the Members for Bolton, West (Ms Kelly), for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford) and for Pontefract and Castleford (Yvette Cooper)—all new Labour women Members of Parliament who paid tribute to the fact that we have got this about right. Indeed, I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford said that the Budget would benefit women five times more than men. I am not sure whether that appears in our briefing, but if not, well done; I am pleased to use the statistic in my contribution to the debate.

We inherited a situation caused by the Conservatives, who doubled the national debt. We were in a cyclical deficit and a structural deficit and had accelerating interest rates—all because of their failure to act. In the interim, we have acted. We have set in place an economic and social reform framework that will stand this country in good stead and I commend it to the House.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

Prison Health Service

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Pope.]

10 pm

Helen Jones (Warrington, North): I am grateful to have the opportunity in this short Adjournment debate to raise the problems of the prison health service. I recognise that it is not a popular subject for debate and would not be so even if it were not held at 10 o'clock on a Thursday evening. Prisoners are not a favourite cause, and their welfare is not at the forefront of most people's minds. However, the strength of the House can be measured by the way in which it deals with unpopular subjects. Similarly, the health of our society can be gauged by the way in which it deals with those who have offended against its laws.

For that reason, my first premise is that we ought to expect for prisoners the same standards of health care that we expect for ourselves. Their punishment is to serve their sentence. They have not been sentenced to be deprived of adequate health care. Yet it is clear that the present system that operates within our prisons fails to deliver the standard of care that we ought to expect and is fatally flawed. That is recognised by prisoners and by many of the staff who work in the service, and it was recognised most of all by the chief inspector of prisons in his report, "Patient or Prisoner", which was published in 1996. That report ought to be commended not only to hon. Members, but to anyone interested in the Prison Service. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister of State will be looking into its conclusions carefully and considering how to take them forward.

From that document and from every other source, it is clear that the prison health service fails on three counts. It fails to provide proper health care for prisoners and an adequate career path for staff, and it also fails to meet the needs of society.

The two major problems that we have to deal with in our prisons are addictive behaviour and mental health. If a prisoner goes into prison addicted to drugs and comes out addicted or goes in with mental health problems that are not dealt with in prison, that prisoner is much more likely to reoffend, and we must bear that in mind.

Instead, we should be creating a system that ensures that those problems do not occur, as far as possible, and are tackled in prison. We must also ensure that staff working in the system—we have to admit that they are working in difficult and sometimes dangerous conditions—are adequately trained and properly managed. While the dedication of many of those staff is not at issue, the real problem with the prison health service is that it lacks proper central direction and is not clear about its aims and objectives.

In some areas, we have no idea what is happening. In a written answer, the Minister said:

"The aims and objectives of the prison health care service are set out in centrally published Health Care Standards".

That is right and commendable, but the answer goes on to say that, while many institutions observe those standards, "statistics are not available centrally about the proportion that do this."—[Official Report, 20 January 1998; Vol. 304, c. 518.]

Responsibility for health care in prisons is left to the governor, who is not obliged to follow any particular model of care. No patients charter is applicable in prison to ensure minimum standards. I do not seek to apportion blame for the situation. To be honest, the system has persisted regardless of which party has been in power.

The Prison Service and the national health service have established a joint working group to consider the way forward in prison health care, but it is amazing that we cannot even say which establishments follow the central aims of the Prison Service in that regard.

Another cause for concern is the lack of suitably qualified staff in our prisons. I learned from a written answer in November that there were 14 prison establishments with vacancies for either full-time or part-time medical officers. That is bad enough in itself, but the situation regarding the qualifications of staff in our prisons and the training that they are offered is even worse.

As anyone who has ever visited a health care centre in a prison knows, the staff work with very difficult patients who are demanding and can be violent, so it is essential that they have adequate training and are properly managed, yet medical officers get only a two-week induction course in prison health care, and many prisons still do not have health care managers as recommended in the chief inspector's report.

Data are not collected centrally, but the Minister told me in a written answer that are registered nurses. We do not know how many nurses or other health care staff are undertaking national vocational qualifications or other courses in health care management. I fail to see how the prison health service can function properly with a lack of NHS-trained managers. The fact that we do not even have adequate data is extremely worrying.

"data from 122 establishments indicate that . . . 34 per cent. of health care managers"—[Official Report, 13 November 1997; Vol. 300, c. 653.]

The lack of qualified staff to deal with mental health care and addiction is apparent. Because mental health problems are so widespread, it is important to have staff who can cope with them; yet of 197 doctors employed in the Prison Service, only 21 are members of the Royal College of Psychiatrists or hold a diploma in psychiatric medicine.

The training of other staff in dealing with mentally disordered offenders is very patchy, and only 21 per cent. of all health care officers and nursing grades employed in prisons are registered mental nurses. Under those conditions, the service cannot be expected to cope with the number of prisoners with mental health problems.

There are further grounds for concern about how we deal with mentally disordered offenders. The Mental Health Act 1983 does not apply in prisons, so the code of practice on seclusion does not apply either. The guidelines are issued for guidance to prison doctors, but they are not bound by them. I suggest that that is yet another example of the standards of health care that we expect outside prisons not applying within them.

There is also a real problem with the transfer of prisoners to psychiatric institutions. It is true that, once the warrant is issued, those transfers take place very quickly. However, I have talked to prison staff who have made it clear that it sometimes takes a long time to reach that stage. It is often difficult to get doctors to assess prisoners and find proper placements for them. At one time, the Prison Service estimated that 2,000 prisoners should be transferred to NHS psychiatric care, but could find places for only about 700. The situation was so bad that the chief inspector recommended the establishment of new units for day care centres and 24-hour nursing. However, there has been little progress towards those objectives.

We all recognise that there is a widespread problem with drug abuse in our prisons, yet only 25 per cent. of doctors who work in prisons are trained to deal with addictive behaviour. While I welcome the research carried out in our prisons into drug treatment programmes and the assessments of the impact of mandatory drug testing on the patterns of drug abuse, much remains to be done. Risley in my constituency is in the process of establishing a drugs treatment centre. The officers involved in that project are very enthusiastic about it. They recognise that, while prisoners are rightly punished for drug use in prison, we are not tackling the real problem unless we do something to break the cycle of drug dependency.

Unfortunately, initiatives such as that are few and far between. The same is true in other areas of prison life. For instance, it is clear from the chief inspector's report that care for young offenders is very patchy. There are also serious problems with the care of pregnant women in prison. The Royal College of Midwives' guidelines for prisoners, on pregnancy and childbirth, have yet to be implemented in many establishments.

A further concern is general health promotion and health education in prisons. Some basic awareness training in the area of HIV and AIDS is provided—usually in the first weeks of imprisonment—but much more must be done to educate prisoners about healthy life style choices, treatment and how to prevent ill health. I was heartened to meet recently some nurses from Winchester and to hear what they are doing. They are working in a wing of the prison rather than in a health care centre, so that they are available for appointments with prisoners and can answer questions about any aspect of health care.

Such initiatives point the way forward. However, the real problem with the current system is that it depends on individual staff and governors to take action. We need consistency and co-operation throughout the service, so that standards can be improved and best practice can spread. That is what we are trying to achieve in the national health service, and we should try to achieve it in prisons as well.

I accept that the problems facing the prison health service cannot be put right overnight. However, we must face the fact that health care for prisoners is below the standard of that received by the ordinary population, in terms of both quality of care and access to services. The question is how we should move forward. We must recognise that recruiting more qualified staff is the key to progress. As things stand, there is little incentive for doctors or nurses to work in prisons. There is no real career path, and there are fewer promotion prospects than there are outside.

We also have to be honest and say that prison staff face real ethical dilemmas concerning privacy, confidentiality and the exercise of their clinical judgment; and whether they might appear in conflict with the prison authority.

There is no continuity of planning between the NHS and the Prison Service, and there are no common standards for health care. That is why it is vital in the long term that the prison health service is integrated into the NHS. Such a move would have major benefits for the quality of patient care and for the training and professional development of staff.

I also recognise that that is not so easy to achieve. Major resource implications should be recognised. The prison population is a significantly higher user of the health service than people of the equivalent age and sex elsewhere. In addition, as I hope I have pointed out, prisoners have hidden health care needs that are not being met and which will increase costs.

It is clear, too, that other issues will have to be tackled, such as the lines of managerial accountability and the relationship between primary and specialist care, which is probably needed more in prisons than outside.

In that situation, it is not easy to move forward, but I hope that the Government will accept that doing nothing is not an option. I hope that when my hon. Friend the Minister of State replies, she will consider some of the ways in which we could progress. If we cannot arrive at the point that we would wish immediately, I hope that the Government will at least consider some pilot projects from which we could learn, and move on from there.

There are many possibilities. For example, prisons could be linked with local trusts. We could consider linking prisons with psychiatric care outside, perhaps a regional secure unit. Such a system might provide easier transfers and better opportunities for research and staff development.

But whatever we do, we must ensure that qualified staff are attracted into our prisons and that we tackle the major health care problems. There are opportunities as well as problems. For example, there are opportunities to consider multi-disciplinary health care within our prisons, involving nurses much more in health care.

If we do not do something, the service will continue to fail to meet the needs of those in prison and of society. I hope that, in the end, we shall be able to tackle the problem. It is not an easy one and it is not a popular cause, but it must be tackled urgently. I hope that my hon. Friend will suggest some ways in which we might go forward and tell us her thinking on these issues.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Ms Joyce Quin): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) on her good fortune in securing this Adjournment debate and on her choice of subject. I welcome the opportunity to speak to the House on the subject of the prison health care service and how the Government see its future.

My hon. Friend has taken an active interest in the matter during the past year, particularly through her various written questions on the subject, which I welcome. It is an important subject, in which many hon. Members have a keen interest.

The Prison Service, in its statement of purpose, has the duty of imprisoning those sent to prison by the courts, and also owes a duty of care to the people in its custody. It must also prepare them for release.

I was glad that my hon. Friend recognised that the provision of health care is an important dimension of that duty. However, I do not want the House to be under any illusions about the difficulties involved in that task, or the challenges that it presents to staff.

[Ms Joyce Quin]

Perhaps I could give some statistics as a background. In the last financial year, 1996–97, about 200,000 prisoners passed through the prison system. The average daily population rose from 53,740 at the end of March 1996 to 59,161 at the end of March 1997. The most recent figure is slightly over 65,000. During that period, the prison health care service handled more than 2 million health-related consultations with inmates. Around 190,000 of these were with visiting NHS consultants providing treatment and care in a variety of specialisms: psychiatry, dentistry, optometry, radiography, and so on.

On 37,000 occasions, prisoners were sent to NHS hospitals as out-patients or in-patients. That represents a good deal of work. Prisons are closed and secure institutions, and, as my hon. Friend recognised, many of the things that are simple and straightforward in the community take on a more complicated character in prison.

My hon. Friend also recognised that, as a group, prisoners are not typical of the general population. That is perhaps obvious, but it is particularly true in health terms. The prison population is predominantly young and male, with a higher incidence of mental disorder and a higher propensity to suicide. They are more likely to smoke—80 per cent. of prisoners do—and to have a drug-taking habit.

By contrast, the equivalent male age group in the community at large tends to make comparatively few demands on health services. All these factors, coupled with the facts and necessary consequences of custody—security, control of medication, particular care for the vulnerable, depressed or suicidal and mentally disordered—make providing health care in prisons a challenge both to health care professionals and to uniformed staff.

An Institute of Psychiatry survey showed that around 38 per cent. of sentenced prisoners suffer some form of mental disorder, although it is important to recognise that, within that figure, we also include those who have some degree of substance misuse or addiction.

A similar survey completed in 1993–94 found that the incidence of mental disorder in the remand population was much higher, at around 66 per cent. In terms of the current population, that translates to around 20,000 sentenced prisoners and 8,300 remand prisoners having some kind of mental disorder: psychosis, neurosis, personality disorder, substance misuse or addiction.

I am glad that random mandatory drug testing appears to be having an impact on drug misuse. The figures available for this year show that 21 per cent. of tests are proving positive—against 24 per cent. last year. The great majority of positive results are for cannabis, but 4 per cent. prove positive for opiates. The fact remains that some prisoners continue to take part in risky behaviour—taking drugs and sharing needles.

We are in the relatively fortunate position that the human immune deficiency virus is not prevalent in our prisons, but we know from experience in other countries that prisons could readily become reservoirs of communicable diseases—HIV, hepatitis B and C, tuberculosis and others. Therefore, we cannot afford to be complacent. Unless care and precautions are taken, there is potential for a serious threat to prisoners' health, the health of their families, prison staff and, ultimately, the wider community.

Improving the effectiveness of the health care that prisoners receive makes obvious sense: a large number of prisoners spend relatively short periods in custody, during which time effective health care and the prevention of disease can make a positive impact when they return to their home community.

I should underline that good work is being done in response to those challenges. In my visits to various prisons, I have seen the commitment and dedication of prison staff and those who provide health care in prisons. Indeed, they have managed well against the pressures of a rising population, which makes special demands. None the less, many tasks are being taken forward, and there are plans for the future. I hope that I shall be able to refer to these briefly.

The Prison Service is pressing forward with work to develop prisons as places where the promotion of health measures as well as treatment of health problems can take place so that we can encourage prisoners to adopt healthier life styles. An internal awards scheme, which was run for the first time last year, has shown early positive results, with 20 prisons receiving some form of commendation.

A range of pilot drug treatment and counselling programmes has begun. About £6 million was spent in centrally funded projects in the current year, and about as much again was spent by prisons from local budgets. My hon. Friend referred to that work, and the Government want to increase the number of voluntary testing units, at which people in our prisons can live and be supported in a drug-free environment. About 4,000 places are currently available, and the Under-Secretary and I have visited operational schemes.

Plans are in hand to increase the number of therapeutic community places, similar to those available at Grendon prison, which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and I visited recently. A range of research suggests that Grendon-type therapy courses have beneficial effects in terms of psychological change and reoffending behaviour.

The number of prisoners transferred to NHS hospitals for in-patient treatment for mental disorder has increased significantly in the 1990s. It is difficult to cope with demand; there has been a fivefold increase in transfers since 1986. The NHS is playing its part in expanding facilities—a growing number of services in prison are provided by NHS specialists.

A range of training is in place or being developed to improve the skills and knowledge of health care staff and prison doctors. I agree with my hon. Friend that the central collection of statistics could be strengthened to make the position clearer, and the Government are keen to address the patchiness and variability of provision.

Training in dealing with communicable diseases is being stepped up, and prisons are required to have multidisciplinary teams to manage HIV and AIDS treatment. Their training is being extended to other communicable diseases. I have visited good induction schemes for prisoners in which HIV and AIDS awareness plays an important part. The schemes are imaginatively delivered in some prisons via video programmes, which effectively communicate the message to prisoners.

Historically, health care in prison has been the responsibility of the Prison Service, and has been organised outside the NHS. Ultimately, accountability rests with the Home Secretary, alongside that for prisons and the management of prisoners. In practice, as statistics show, the NHS has been drawn into providing some health care, particularly of a specialist nature. Indeed, the pattern of provision is quite varied. The majority of primary care is provided by directly employed staff, but, increasingly, NHS or private sector health care providers play a complementary role.

The pattern of organisation and provision reflects in part an attempt by prisons to meet local needs, but is also in large measure the result of history, and inadequately co-ordinated development. There are good examples, which might serve as models that could be applied more generally, but also rather poor ones.

My hon. Friend referred to the thematic review undertaken by the chief inspector of prisons, Sir David Ramsbotham, who highlighted his anxieties about prison health care in the report, "Patient or Prisoner?" He recommended that responsibility and, ultimately, the budget for the delivery of prisoner health care should move to the NHS. We have not yet reached a view about whether that is the right way forward—it would raise a range of organisation, management and resource issues for the Prison Service and the NHS—but the working group to which my hon. Friend referred, involving the Home Office, the Prison Service and the Department of Health, is important in that respect. I have received an interim briefing from it, and look forward to receiving its recommendations in the near future.

The group's remit is to consider jointly the future organisation and delivery of health care to prisoners. The objectives are to secure improvements in meeting the health needs of prisoners, to tackle the problems and weaknesses in standards, and to deal with the isolation of health care staff. I agree with my hon. Friend that prison health care staff must feel part of a career structure, and must not be isolated from other health care providers and professionals. Prison health responsibility should be seen not as a career cul-de-sac, but as an important part of career development.

Community Care (Residential Accommodation) Bill

Order for Third Reading read.

9.35 am

Mr. Marsha Singh (Bradford, West): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I shall try to be as brief as possible, but first I want to apologise to you, Madam Speaker, and to hon. Members as I shall have to leave before the end of the debate due to a pressing engagement in my constituency. Although I have tried to change it, I have been unable to do so. I shall be opening a post office and I cannot get out of the engagement. I hope that you, Madam Speaker, and the House will accept my apology.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Pound) has kindly agreed to stand in for me and I am grateful to him. However, I cannot see him in the Chamber at the moment; I just hope that he is watching the debate on a television somewhere and will turn up soon.

The Bill is not sexy; it is not controversial and it does not arouse the passions that we have recently witnessed in the House. It is nevertheless an important Bill which will ease the anxieties of older people already in residential care and the many thousands who may need such care in the future. It will enshrine in law their right to keep a proportion of their hard-earned income and savings. Indeed, it is a Bill that may even benefit right hon. and hon. Members, should the need ever arise.

I shall briefly give some background to the Bill. Although there have been rules on capital limits since the National Assistance Act 1948, the current rules came into force in April 1993 under changes introduced in the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990. The changes in means testing for residential care included rules about both income and capital. Previous limits on capital caused grave and widespread concern and it was in response to that concern that in April 1996 the capital limit was raised, following an announcement to that effect in the Budget statement on 28 November 1995. Those changes were, first, that the level of assets at which people would no longer be eligible for assistance was doubled from £8,000 to £16,000 and, secondly, that the level of capital at which they would start to make a contribution was raised from £3,000 to £10,000.

The former right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, said:

"In this Budget I shall be helping people who are earning and people who are saving. But I also want to help the people who have worked and saved all their lives. Some of them may be unfortunate enough to need care in residential or nursing homes in their old age. If they do, they may find their savings eaten away quickly to pay for that care. Of course, that is one of the rainy days for which people save. But the balance between the state paying and the family paying must be right."

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): I apologise for interrupting the hon. Gentleman at so early a stage in the debate. I am slightly confused as he referred to the former Chancellor of the Exchequer as being the right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea. Will he confirm that he means my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke)?

Mr. Singh: I apologise—I made a mistake.

Mr. Garnier: I was confused.

Mr. Singh: It was my confusion, not the hon. and learned Gentleman's.

As I was saying, the former Chancellor said about the balance being right:

"If it is not, many prudent people will complain that they are being treated unfairly compared with those who are unable or unwilling to save at all.

To help people who have already put money aside, it was recently decided to exempt from VAT some forms of care provided in someone's own home. I now have two important further proposals.

First, I intend to exempt from tax the benefits from a range of insurance policies that provide long-term care benefits. We should encourage, not penalise, people who decide to take more responsibility for themselves.

Secondly, at present only people with assets worth less than £3,000 are not asked to make any contribution from their capital towards the costs of residential or nursing home care. People with assets worth more than £8,000 receive no financial support from the Government. When applied to care in residential and nursing homes, those limits are far too low.

From April, and sooner if practicable, we shall more than treble the lower threshold, from £3,000 to £10,000, and double the upper threshold, from £8,000 to £16,000. That means that people in residential care who have worked hard and saved will now keep more of their own money. It will give many elderly people and their families more financial security and greater peace of mind. But we also want to find more ways of helping people who are now in work or recently retired and want to plan ahead to prepare for their old age."—[Official Report, 28 November 1996; Vol. 267, c.1067.]

The next day, the then Secretary of State for Social Security, the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) said:

"One of the main financial concerns facing elderly people is the prospect of needing long-term care. Providing for their needs in old age is, of course, one of the reasons why people save, but Age Concern and others have argued that the capital limits applying to people in residential and nursing care are tougher than the rules for people who stay in their own homes. They have urged us to raise the capital limits for residential and nursing care to those that apply to housing benefit.

We are going further than that. We are not just doubling the upper limit to £16,000 but more than tripling the lower limit. Under our proposals, people with up to £16,000 of assets will qualify for state help and people with capital of less than £10,000 will not be required to make any contribution from their capital towards the cost of basic residential care."—[Official Report, 29 November 1996; Vol. 267, c. 1214–15.]

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): I am listening to the hon. Gentleman with great interest. Will he explain how he has arrived at the new thresholds? It will be interesting for the House to know whether the hon. Gentleman has talked to the Treasury about this matter, as there are grave financial implications.

Mr. Singh: If the hon. Gentleman had listened to what I was saying he would know that those thresholds were introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget statement in 1995 and by the Secretary of State for Social Security the day after the Budget statement. Those thresholds are not new, but existing ones that were introduced by the previous Government—the money was allocated in the 1995 Budget.

Mr. Tredinnick: The hon. Gentleman must forgive me if I did not understand him correctly. What I was getting at was whether the current Treasury team under the new Government had given its part or total blessing to the Bill. It is one thing to look at what the Conservative Government proposed, but there has been a change of Government—indeed, the hon. Gentleman is here because of that change of Government. It is germane to the debate for us to have an understanding of the hon. Gentleman's arrangement with the Treasury as, without that, the basis of the debate is undermined.

Mr. Singh: The thresholds and the capital limits were contained in that Budget statement—the finances were allocated.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Paul Boateng): Perhaps I can assist the hon. Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick). I shall be making the Government's position clear in due course, but I can say now that we have no problem with the limits.

Mr. Singh: I do not have the words to speak on the Bill as eloquently as did the then Chancellor of the Exchequer and the then Secretary of State for Social Security in the debates when the capital and income limits were introduced.

Those changes were welcomed by the whole House and they should have been implemented without any problems, but local authorities began to abuse the rules in different ways. Sefton borough council decided to disregard the limits and adopted a strict rationing regime. Dozens of people were refused assistance—dozens of people had to wait until their assets were below £1,500 before they could receive help they needed. That £1,500 was just enough to pay the funeral expenses. Dozens of people in Sefton were subjected to misery and hardship.

Help the Aged took the matter to judicial review and, to everybody's surprise, the judge upheld the actions of Sefton council.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): I think that on these occasions fair dues all round should be the case. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will also give credit to Age Concern, which also brought the judicial review to which he referred.

Mr. Singh: I shall pay due tribute to Age Concern during my speech.

The judge's decision led to widespread anxiety among older people, their families, their carers and organisations acting for them, such as Help the Aged and Age Concern. Thankfully, the Sefton judgment was overturned in the Appeal Court on 31 July 1997, but there is still a great deal of uncertainty and anxiety among older people and organisations acting for them because of the Sefton judgment.

I am reliably informed that some local authorities are telling people with less than £16,000 to go on waiting lists. Long delays in assessments are leading people to eat into their own assets—assets which were supposed to have been guaranteed by the House—and local authorities frequently refuse to backdate the funding. The process constitutes a form of Sefton by the back door, which is a disgraceful state of affairs. That is why the Bill is necessary.

It is essential that the law makes the position absolutely clear. If our previous guarantees to older people are being flouted, we must legislate. It is essential that, through the Bill, we amend the National Assistance Act 1948. I hope that the Department of Health will go further and ensure that assessment of need is separate from, and precedes, assessment of a person's financial circumstances.

I hope that the Department will ensure that local authorities do not unreasonably refuse to assess someone for community care services and residential accommodation. I hope that the Department will ensure that local authorities do not delay assessments by setting deadlines. I hope that the Department will ensure that local authorities have a duty to carry out an assessment, whether or not care and attention is otherwise available. I hope that the Department will ensure that, once a person is assessed as needing residential care, lack of resources cannot be used as a reason for refusing or delaying care.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid–Sussex): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way and I have a great deal of sympathy with the points that he is making. Does he agree that we are talking about a two-sided contract? It is not just that the local authorities should, as he rightly says, speedily undertake those assessments so that old people are able to move to another care regime; local authorities should pay nursing homes and other institutions promptly for the services that they have contracted from them. Some councils do not. I am dealing with such a case in my constituency, where a nursing home has persistently been kept waiting by a county council under a contract arrangement, to the great disadvantage of the people who live there.

Mr. Singh: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I hope that the Government Bill that will set out a statutory right to interest on the late payment of bills will help. If there is a contract, the local authority involved should pay on time. I am sure that the Bill to which I have referred will involve local authorities.

I said in my introduction that this is not a Bill which excites passions, but I believe it should. We should be passionate about the rights of older people. We should be passionate about the fact that older people are being ripped off. We should be passionate also if older people are being denied the care to which they are entitled. Older people should be able to keep the assets that they worked hard to secure and for which they saved hard. Every right hon. and hon. Member may one day be grateful for that passion.

Finally, I thank Age Concern, Help the Aged and the Department of Health for their help and advice and I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for his encouragement. I commend the Bill to the House.

9.51 am

Mr. Richard Page (South-West Hertfordshire): I congratulate the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Singh) on bringing the Bill before the House. There is a skill in choosing Bills that are available to private Members—ones that will not cause excitement and delay. It is wise to choose a Bill that can speedily pass through the House and take its place on the statute book, especially if it will provide the support and help that is intended.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned passion. I believe that the Bill raises a passionate issue and one for which we should fight. If we cannot help the elderly, who can we help?

Mr. Singh: I said in my introduction that the Bill has not excited passion and that has not aroused the passions that we have witnessed recently in the House. I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman that it should excite passion because we should be passionate about the rights of older people.

Mr. Page: There is no dissension between us. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the Bill fully deserves the support of the whole House. Hon. Members on both sides who have supported the Bill have given us the opportunity to clarify the responsibilities of local authorities towards people who are in need of residential care.

I find it rather sad that local authorities should abuse weaker members of society, but I suppose that Parliament is here to ensure that such people are protected.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): We should not talk of local authorities as a whole but of Sefton, which at the time had no overall political party control although it had a number of Liberal councillors. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is appalling that on a day when the House will be debating several significant Bills there is not one member of the Liberal party present in the Chamber?

Mr. Page rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. Let us concentrate on the matters that are before us and not on who is here and who is not.

Mr. Page: I entirely agree, Mr. Martin. I was about to chide my hon. Friend by saying that it is not my responsibility to run the Liberal party, tempting though that might be.

Mr. Singh: Sefton council has become notorious for what it did, but let us not forget that other local authorities have been doing a Sefton by the back door.

Mr. Page: That is a matter on which I shall touch lightly when I make some further remarks. I disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) to the extent that Sefton is not alone; there are one or two other councils that are playing the same game. I am sure that if my hon. Friend reads the details that are in front of him this will all become relatively clear.

It is right that people who have a reasonable amount of capital should be asked to make a contribution towards the cost of their care. I do not think that everyone should lie back and rely on the state, saying, "Give me the necessary money." That view was taken by the previous Parliament and I am glad that it is sustained in the Bill.

Mr. Soames: I am sorry to interrupt my hon. Friend as he moves into the full power of his oratory. I am sure that he agrees that the Bill is important and that the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Singh), who I am sure is not moving too far from his place, deserves great credit for introducing it. However, there are many Conservative Members—[Interruption.] I think that of one of my hon. Friends' pacemakers is going off. Let us hope that it is nothing serious. A by-election would be inconvenient for my party at the moment.

There are many on the Conservative Benches who feel that the Bill should have been introduced as a Government Bill. Is it not odd that the Government, when in opposition, were extremely earnest on this issue but have chosen the long, detailed and difficult way of introducing legislation—although extremely competently presented—through a private Member's Bill when the matter could have been dealt with perfectly well in last year's Finance Bill?

Mr. Page: For the record, it was not my pacemaker that was going off. Mine is under control.

I can only agree with my hon. Friend. The Bill deals with an issue which should have been dealt with on the statute book earlier. The private Member's Bill procedure is a well-known route but it is subject to the hazards and vagaries of the House, as one or two other hon. Members have discovered on producing private Members' Bills. I am glad that this Bill will not be thwarted by other hon. Members, but will go through the House and on to the statute book. I hope that that process will be as quick as possible. If I may proceed with my speech without the support of my colleagues intervening every 30 seconds we might make some progress.

As I have said, I believe it right that members of the public should make a contribution towards their upkeep as they become older and if they have some resources. It is entirely wrong that some local authorities have cynically attempted to create and exploit the technical language—the hon. Member for Bradford, West referred to this briefly—in sections 21 and 22 of the National Assistance Act 1948 to avoid meeting their justifiable responsibilities. They have chosen to do so until elderly people's savings have been reduced to less than £1,500.

As the hon. Member said, it was the intention of the previous Government, approved by Parliament, that once an individual's capital fell below £16,000, and subject to the level of their income, local authorities should begin to contribute towards the cost of their accommodation and that once that individual's capital had fallen to £10,000, local authorities should meet the full cost. The Bill would ensure that there is no legal loophole that allows local authorities that want to take advantage of the elderly to disregard those requirements.

Sir Nicholas Lyell (North-East Bedfordshire): My hon. Friend says that the Bill would ensure that there will be no legal loophole. That is one of the things that we have the opportunity to test in the Minister's presence on Third Reading. There is a serious question whether the Bill does not still leave a legal loophole; I understand that if the local authority thinks a person is not in need of care and attention because he or she still has enough money—between £16,000 and £1,500—to continue to pay for himself or herself at home or in some other form of care, the Bill will not bite. Has my hon. Friend had an opportunity to consider that question?

Mr. Page: My right hon. and learned Friend makes a valuable point. I hope that the Minister will clarify that issue when he replies. Accommodation today is so expensive that, frankly, it would be only a matter of months before the local authority's decision to take up, instead of avoid, its responsibilities would be thrust upon it. This issue needs to be clarified, not only to ensure that local authorities behave in future but for the peace of mind of elderly people.

When they are young and active, as you are Mr. Deputy Speaker, people have confidence, but when they become elderly and frail they need help and support. They do not need the worry that they could suddenly be in desperate need of support from local authorities or the various bodies that exist to help.

Hon. Members will be familiar with local authorities' claim that they are underfunded. The director of my local social services authority, Hertfordshire county council, wrote to me last October saying that demand from elderly people for services was rising in line with the growth in their number. He was afraid that the county council budget could not cope with the demand. As a result, basic services such as shopping and cleaning help have been withdrawn—despite a huge increase in Hertfordshire's council tax this year of some 10 per cent: it is a Lib-Lab-run authority—so that the authority can concentrate on those who, unfortunately, are housebound or unable to feed and wash themselves.

I am deluged by letters from elderly people who need help and support. Their letters are exceedingly moving and worrying. It is difficult to reconcile the huge increase in Hertfordshire's council tax and the huge cut in its services with the fact that London seems to have survived swingeing cuts. The fact that there might be an election, of course, is pure coincidence, and I must not let anybody draw any inferences from the lack of services in Hertfordshire.

Mr. Tredinnick: I am listening with interest to my hon. Friend. What specific concerns have been expressed by elderly constituents? Their main concern is covered by the Bill, but it would be interesting to know whether he has deduced anything in particular from his correspondence.

Mr. Page: My hon. Friend tempts me down paths that are peripheral to the Bill. I make the point that the concerns expressed by the elderly in my constituency result from the cut in services and the lack of financial support. I raise this point because it is germane to the Bill. If we cannot get the financing right, we will not be able to look after people properly. I do not want people to suffer cuts in services through lack of support and finance if that can possibly be avoided.

The list of concerns raised by the elderly is long and serious, but if I had to choose one item that is causing most concern it is the lack of home help for people who are unable to look after themselves but want to stay in their own home. If we do not tackle that properly there will be greater pressure on residential homes as more and more people say, "I want to move into a residential home because I can't cope in my own home." That is why the lack of support for home help is most serious and damaging.

Mr. Gray: Does my hon. Friend agree that, often, the shortage of social services funding for home care and home help comes about not so much through a lack of central Government funding or a lack of funding from local taxpayers as through incompetent handling of the funds available to the social services department? He will be interested to hear that Wiltshire county council—a Lib-Lab council—spends some £70 to £80 a week more putting people in long-term care homes run by the county council as an ideological preference to the perfectly excellent private homes throughout the county. Does he agree that that is a disgrace and that the net effect is precisely the shortfall in home care that he describes?

Mr. Page: I do not want to chide my hon. Friend, but he is trying to lead me into areas about which I have no knowledge and expertise. I have no idea about the way in which his council operates. I have no idea about its policies—just as I have no responsibility for the Liberal Democrats.

I return to the point that I was making. If we do not get our finances correct, greater pressures will be placed on residential homes, and that will mean even greater pressure on the taxpayer. That is why I come back to the sensible, lower-cost support of home help, which has enabled people to stay in their own homes, in their own community, which, ultimately, reduces the bill to the taxpayer. It is a win-win situation. I suggest that my hon. Friend goes back to his council and suggests that this is a way in which costs could be reduced to the greater enjoyment of elderly people.

I shall not go on about the shortcomings of councils—Hertfordshire or any other. I produced the example of Hertfordshire because I know that the arguments of local authorities that cannot meet their full obligations to the elderly because of a lack of financial resources is one with which Ministers in the present Government will become more familiar in the years ahead.

I cannot believe that any local authority can seriously maintain that the capital of an individual in its area should fall below £1,500 before it feels legally bound to offer assistance to meet the costs of residential accommodation.

The hon. Member for Bradford, West referred to the cost of a funeral. I am not an expert on the cost of funerals in Merseyside, but I studied some figures produced by the National Association of Funeral Directors. In parts of the country, a standard burial costs more than £2,000. If the Bill did not address the issue of savings, everybody in Merseyside in this situation would have to be cremated, as the choice of a burial would be beyond them.

The conduct of Sefton metropolitan borough council in trying to insist that people in need of residential care should have their savings reduced to this minute level merits outright public condemnation. It puts its emphasis on its policy—draining the resources of vulnerable people—above its duty of care. Moreover, it does so on the basis of the argument that possessing capital of more than £1,500 and less than £16,000 means that people might have the means to secure the care and attention that they require.

If that really is the substance of the council's position, it means that it places its accounting position ahead of its legal obligation to help elderly and vulnerable people. Morally, that is a shallow, repugnant argument. Legally, as has been said, the Appeal Court judgment last October showed that that argument is morally and legally bankrupt. The council's defence—that its actions were solely driven by its lack of financial resources and that it had no desire to challenge the law or attack people's savings; that line was taken by the chairman of the social services committee last April—is just not credible. As soon as the judgment of the Court of Appeal went against it, Sefton council's assistant director for older people, Mr. Alan Lewis, told The Independent on 23 October that

"years of financial stringency have paid off and after reviewing our financial circumstances we found we are now able to meet the provisions affecting this particular group of people".

Halfway through this financial year there was money to meet the needs for residential care and accommodation that had previously been impossible to find.

The only redeeming feature of the council's response was that it had become willing to recompense the people who had been wrongly forced to pay the costs of residential accommodation. They will be paid back with interest. The hon. Member for Bradford, West mentioned the statutory right to interest. I am not sure that it is a panacea for all late payment, but I am glad that some extra compensation is to be paid to those people. I am not certain how many are involved. The Independent quoted a figure of 70; The Guardian said that 100 people are affected. However many, if it is more than zero, it is one person too many.

Whatever view the council took of the level of funding provided by the previous or the present Government for the community care programme, the effect of its policy decision was to place its assessment of its financial resources ahead of the assessment of the elderly vulnerable people who needed help to secure appropriate residential accommodation. The elderly in Sefton and one or two other places were being held to ransom in an argument between local government and central Government over the funding levels that the latter should provide. I hope that such a case will never happen again. I am happy to support the Bill.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): I am most grateful to be called today, not least because it gives me an opportunity to talk about a subject that has concerned me for some little while and which I discussed with the Under-Secretary of State for Health when we debated, under the auspices of the Hansard Society, the question of the law and Parliament. I am brought to that subject because the Bill has its genesis in the case of the Crown v. Sefton metropolitan borough council.

It is often said, as much by Conservative Members of Parliament as others I fear, that judges and lawyers are out of touch with the real world. In the case of Mrs. Blanchard, who was the victim of Sefton metropolitan borough council's community care policy, the Court of Appeal, presided over by the Master of the Rolls, Lord Woolf, reached a conclusion that demonstrated not that the courts were out of touch with the real world but that they were very much in touch with it. I hope that my hon. Friends who have taken a different view to mine—a view that the Minister shares—will from, in the light of maturer reflection and the Master of the Roll's judgment, come to take a more sympathetic view.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Faversham and Mid-Kent): Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that the chances of judges in the Court of Appeal being in touch are far greater in cases involving people over 75 than in almost any other kind of case?

Mr. Garnier: I disagree whole-heartedly. The retirement age for members of the Court of Appeal is 75, so the point that my hon. Friend makes is a bad one. It demonstrates one of the difficulties that we have. It is easy to assume that the Court of Appeal exists in some sort of Gilbertian world in which a lot of geriatrics are finding it difficult to string two words together or reach rational conclusions. If my hon. Friend cares to look, he will find that the quality of the intellects of those who sit on the Court of Appeal bench is immensely superior to that which is demonstrated by the profusion of words to which we sometimes listen in this Chamber. I have to be careful. Here I am trying to persuade my hon. Friend that my argument is good, attractive and worthy of support. The last thing that I want to do is to be accused of being abusive to him. All that I would say is that the premise on which he advanced that intervention was wrong. I hope that he will care to go to "Who's Who" and look up the ages of Lord Woolf, and Lord Justices Roch and Henry. He will find that they are some little way under the age of 75 and even 70.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Singh) on his Bill and on choosing a subject which is largely uncontroversial and brings with it a social benefit, unlike some of the other private Members' Bills that we have discussed recently. I dare say that many people in the hon. Gentleman's metropolitan area in the west riding of Yorkshire will feel that he has done them a service. I congratulate him on that. I want to analyse to some extent the decision of the Court of Appeal presided over by the Master of the Rolls last July so that my hon. Friends, who have appeared in greater numbers than Government supporters, can understand why I believe that the relationship between two great limbs of our constitution—the judiciary and the legislature—can be fostered to assist the third limb of our constitution, which is, the Executive, represented most ably today by the three hon. Members on the Treasury Bench—the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry, and the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland). If that relationship is fostered, the House and the other place will produce and digest legislation in a way that produces better law. I believe that the Bill is a product of a sensible union of view and opinion.

The Master of the Rolls said at the outset of the Sefton case that he identified three main issues. I suggest that those issues applied not only to the facts of that case but to the general area of social policy involved. As the

Under-Secretary of State for Health already appreciates, having practised in the courts and no doubt dealt with similar cases, the case involved three primary issues. The first was whether a local authority, in deciding whether an elderly person was in need of care and attention—in which case it would be required to make arrangements for residential accommodation to be available to her—was entitled under section 21(1)(a) of the National Assistance Act 1948, to have regard to its limited financial resources. That is the big political question to which the Bill attempts to provide an answer that is acceptable to most people.

The second issue that the Master of the Rolls identified was whether if Sefton's limited resources were relevant, they justified the policy that it adopted. It is a policy which many cash-strapped local authorities have to consider. It is perhaps unfortunate for Sefton that it is the first borough council to have caught the attention of the relevant charitable interest groups and that its activities and policy have persuaded a charity to take the matter to court.

The third issue was whether, in determining whether care and attention was not otherwise available to a person, an authority was entitled to take the resources of that person into account, even if they fell below the levels prescribed by the National Assistance (Assessment of Resources) Regulations 1992 for the purposes of sections 22 to 26 of the 1948 Act.

I appreciate that, at the moment, that sounds deeply dry, deeply boring and thoroughly technical, but, unless one understands the foundations of social policy and the legal framework within which it is constructed, it is extremely difficult to understand quite why the Bill promoted by the hon. Member for Bradford, West is a beacon, or perhaps even a lighthouse, for other jurisdictions and other countries.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: My hon. and learned Friend may be able to assist the Under-Secretary of State for Health by highlighting a real point in this case. It is not entirely clear to me whether Sefton borough council took into account the fact that it was strapped for resources, and therefore had a policy under which people had to spend their modest capital, down to £1,500, or whether it believed that people with between £1,500 and £16,000 were not in need of care, because they had a small amount of personal resource to look after themselves. Can my hon. and learned Friend elucidate that point?

Mr. Garnier: After six or seven years as a Member of Parliament, I have learnt that the Under-Secretary rarely needs help, and when he does, he does not take it. However, I shall try to help with the argument put to me by my right hon. and learned Friend by having a go at explaining what Sefton borough council was doing, which may help with our deliberations. If I get my explanation wrong, I am sure that the Under-Secretary, who is listening with great rapture, will put me right with the assistance of his official advisers.

There has been a great deal of press and other comment on the case. As I understand it, the borough council was applying its policy in a discriminatory way to distinguish, perhaps for financial or other reasons, between what it regarded as real welfare cases involving elderly residents who had become enfeebled enough to need residential care, as happens with elderly residents in Manchester, in Sheffield, in Bedfordshire or in north Wiltshire, and elderly people who had put themselves in retirement homes in the seaside resort of Southport pre-emptively—before they needed residential care as the Department of Health understands it—and while they were still in relatively good health.

The bulk of Sefton borough council's policy addressed the issue of who was and was not to be assessed as needing residential care. The matter of their capital allowances were a detail of that policy, but it has taken on far greater significance for obvious political and social policy reasons, perhaps because Sefton borough council was insensitive and inept in the way in which it developed, arrived at and presented its policy.

Mr. Page: Did not the chairman of the social services committee take the position that the council had no desire to take away the savings of elderly people, or to challenge the law? The council's defence was that its actions were solely driven by its lack of financial resource.

Mr. Garnier: I am sure that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has no desire to bankrupt my constituents by imposing an extra 20p a gallon on fuel duty, but that will be the consequence. Any decision maker in national politics, national Government or local government must be taken to have accepted responsibility for, and anticipated the consequences of, his decisions. I cannot acquit the official at Sefton borough council of ignorance or of lack of responsibility for the consequences of his actions or advice any more than I can acquit the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose colleague the Under-Secretary looks a little puzzled. I dare say that the cost of petrol does not affect his constituents in Brent quite as much as it does mine. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for South–West Hertfordshire (Mr. Page) will allow me to leave that point hanging for others to pick up.

I am happy that Labour Back-Bench representation in the Chamber has now trebled, and three Labour Back Benchers are present.

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North): Quality, not quantity.

Mr. Garnier: I am sure that that is entirely right. I offer my congratulations to the hon. Gentleman on his half century this year: we should therefore discuss community care for the elderly with some care.

In the Sefton case, which I was briefly analysing, the—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman will assist me. We have discussed the background to the Bill at great length, and we must now speak about its content. He has assisted me and given me a grasp of why we are having such a debate on Third Reading, but we have passed from the debate on the background—what is done is done. We are discussing Third Reading, and we should talk about content.

Mr. Garnier: I fully understand your point, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Perhaps I may illustrate what I am doing by giving this example: a tapestry is composed not only of threads of wool, but of latticework through which the wool is woven.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman makes my point. The backcloth has been fully explained to me. Now I must look at the tapestry.

Mr. Garnier: You are, Mr. Deputy Speaker, a man of great and acute perception. My anxiety is that my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) is not quite as quick as you, and his intervention suggested that further explanation of the backcloth was required so that he would understand the interwoven colours created for us by the hon. Member for Bradford, West, who represents a textile constituency. I shall move on because, if I am not careful, my hon. Friend the Member for South–West Bedfordshire (Sir D. Madel), whose patience may not be as great and accommodating as yours, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may contrive to put me in a community care home.

Rather than wait for my explanation, hon. Members should study the law report on the Sefton case; there is much to learn from it. My hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) wishes to intervene, but I first give way to the hon. Member for Bradford, West.

Mr. Singh: I thank the hon. and learned Gentleman for giving way. I must leave the Chamber, not out of bad manners, but out of necessity. I hope that he will forgive me.

Mr. Garnier: The hon. Gentleman is a man of unfailing courtesy, and I fully understand that he has constituency engagements to attend to. I was slightly amused when he said that he had a post office to open and could not get out of it.

Mr. Singh: I am afraid that stamp duty might be imposed if I am not there.

Mr. Garnier: I send him to Euston station with our good wishes, and trust that by the time that he reads Hansard his Bill will have made the progress that he and its supporters wish for it. I wish him all the best.

I would have made other arguments, but you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, required me to leave them to another forum. Before coming to the second thrust of my argument, I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire.

Mr. Gray: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for giving way before moving to the second thrust of his argument, although I find it hard to understand why he has taken almost 20 minutes to get through the first thrust.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): My hon. and learned Friend is a barrister.

Mr. Gray: Yes, but my hon. and learned Friend is not being paid by the hour in this place.

I bring my hon. and learned Friend back to the reason why he was expatiating a little on the judgment in the Sefton borough council case. An important point about the Bill highlights the difficulties caused by it not having been considered in detail by a Standing Committee.

The point that the judge in the case missed was Sefton borough council's feeling that certain residents of Southport, being perfectly fit and healthy, did not need its financial support. The point about capital allowances is that they are awarded at the point when social services departments decide that a person needs care and attention that would otherwise be unavailable to him. Sefton borough council feels that, following the judgment, many people could receive support who would not otherwise be considered to need it.

Mr. Garnier: That is true, and relates to what I said in response to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Sir N. Lyell). If people are not assessed as needing residential care, the capital allowances for residential care do not apply. The Bill does not bite on that aspect of social policy. It would bite only in the cases of elderly people who had already been assessed as needing residential care, like Mrs. Blanchard.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): The fear that has been expressed in that context is that unscrupulous local authorities might exploit the loophole and fail to assess people at all, or simply not get on with the job. People who fell below the £16,000 threshold would then receive no support from the local authority. Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that, even if that problem cannot be addressed in the Bill, we may have to address it eventually?

Mr. Garnier: It may be possible to address it in the Bill if their lordships take up my hon. Friend's point, but, on Third Reading, it is not for us to do more than acknowledge his point and hope that others who take a close interest in these matters—including the Minister—will do what they think appropriate.

It is still possible for a council to save on the cost of caring for elderly people who have put themselves into homes simply by not assessing them as having any needs as defined by statute. The hon. Member for Bradford, West may not have come to grips with that, but the House should do so before the Bill goes to another place. The capital of elderly people could be run down with no more consideration than the council would have for someone aged 30 who was staying in bed-and-breakfast accommodation or an hotel. How councils behave in such cases will depend on their integrity and good will, and on how they make difficult choices about prioritising their resources.

Government is difficult enough for the Conservative party, but we now have a Labour Government who have not made a decision of any complexity or national significance for 18 years except within their own party system. It is essential for us to remind not only the new Government but local authorities of the huge importance of getting priorities right, and having the courage to stand by their decisions when put to the test. I see that the Minister agrees whole-heartedly with my point about the need to order priorities properly.

The Bill illustrates just one aspect of that need. I hope that, if we allow it a speedy passage to the other place and, eventually, the statute book, borough councillors throughout the country—as well as their officials and advisers—will realise that the House is now watching them to make sure that elderly people are not artificially prevented from gaining access to the care that they so richly deserve after a lifetime of hard work, thrift and saving.

Sir Nicholas Lyell (North-East Bedfordshire): I am grateful for the opportunity to make a brief speech. I welcome the Bill, and congratulate the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Singh) both on promoting it and on steering it successfully through its stages so far.

The question of how to pay for old age is probably one of the most difficult questions of the day. As people get older, they experience real anxiety about how they would manage if they had to go into a home: it preys on everyone's mind, in connection with themselves or elderly relatives. Indeed, they may worry about how their children will manage in the future. This is rightly a topic for political debate.

I shall not dwell on the distinction between the Government and the Opposition—between the Labour and Conservative parties—as reflected in what is sometimes described as the Chancellor's smash-and-grab raid on pension funds through the abolition of advance corporation tax. In a sense, however, that is part of an overall approach to the subject. It is important to enable people to build up capital so that they can care for themselves, and—here there should be common ground between the parties—to keep at least some of that capital to pass on to their children.

I have a particular insight, as one who was first a junior Minister in 1986, in what was then the Department of Health and Social Security. The Minister of State was one John Major, my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon. At that time, Conservative party policy was to increase the amount of protected capital from £3,000 to the still modest figure of £6,000, which has subsequently been increased to the £16,000 in the Bill. It must be borne in mind that that £16,000 is not wholly protected. When people's capital has dwindled to £16,000, which is probably only about half the value of a modest house—even in Sefton, in the north-west of England—they will still have to pay a substantially higher weekly sum for board and lodging in a residential old people's home.

The Bill aims to resolve what was, frankly, an abuse introduced by Sefton borough council. The ideology of those councillors was different from the ideology that I think prevails today—in the country and, I hope, in the Government, although it is their party which predominates in Sefton. I am grateful to the Government for at least moving that far.

Sefton borough council was saying that it would not provide accommodation for someone who was in need of care and attention because of the frailties of old age until that person's capital had dwindled from £16,000 to £1,500. The Bill seeks to correct that, which is why we welcome it. Let me make a point which, although rather technical, is important. Clarification of it, even on Third Reading, may assist the construction of the Act that this Bill will become, and of national assistance Acts generally. The point was highlighted by the Master of the Rolls when the Court of Appeal had to make a decision in the case involving Mrs. Blanchard.

The point is that, provided that it is clear that an old or disabled person—people may be frail for reasons other than old age—is in need of care and attention, there is no entitlement to take into account the local authority's alleged lack of resources. I accept that local authorities are under pressure.

I think that we can be sure, but I should like clarification on the point that one is not entitled to take into account the fact that a person still has £16,000 and that the amount has not dwindled to £1,500. A person who is down to £16,000 must be careful if he is in need of care and attention. He should not be told that he may spend £14,500 on looking after himself and then make another approach to the authority. Such a loophole seems to exist because the fundamental legislation, the national assistance legislation as amended from time to time, refers to people who are in need of care and attention that is not otherwise available to them.

Of course, money gives freedom and the power to purchase services. Notwithstanding the Bill's intention, it could be said that people could spend their money on caring for themselves, perhaps marginally by upping the amount of private home help. That means that they could put off going into residential accommodation for a long time and, of course, that will prolong the anxiety of the elderly and, in practice, it may force them to deplete their modest resources from £16,000 to whatever figure the relevant local authority—it may not be the one in Sefton—may set. It may not stick to £1,500.

I support the Bill and hope that it will be successful in overcoming the difficulty. I have highlighted the issue, albeit at the 11th hour on Third Reading because it is important to bring it to the attention of the House so that the Minister may comment on it. If we cannot put it right at this stage of the Bill's progress, I hope that the Government will be sympathetic to my point and will use some future Finance Bill or assistance Bill to close continuing loopholes.

10.42 am

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Faversham and Mid-Kent): I fear that I have to join the Bill's promoter in apologising to the House because, if the subject is debated for the length of time that it deserves, I may not be here for the final speeches. I hope that the Minister will forgive me if I have to leave early. One of my local hospitals is threatened with closure and all hon. Members will understand that such a matter requires attention from the hon. Member concerned.

We debate this important Bill against a background of quite alarming figures. The latest population estimates of mid-1996 show that the United Kingdom's population aged over 75 numbered 4,192,000. Of course, a high proportion of people who live until the age of 75 will live until they are over 90. One of the enormous difficulties for Britain's elderly is to have any idea of how long they have to budget for. They have absolutely no way—none of us has—of knowing when the asteroid will hit them, and they cannot know how much money they will need or how to apportion it.

The mean cost of residential care is £275 a week. In my part of the country, that is modest, and it is easily seen that the fear of destitution in old age is acute. Research suggests only 7 per cent. of the elderly are confident that their children will look after them. I think that they are being unduly pessimistic because Age Concern figures show that we in this nation still look after elderly relatives. However, 90-year-olds have 65-year-old children and, at the age of 65, many people are not in particularly good health. Their capacity regularly to drive long distances to look after a parent who has moved or from whom they have moved is much impaired. Even those children who want to look after their parents are often in no position to do so.

As the Chancellor told us on Tuesday that the demand for publicly provided residential care at the full cost to the taxpayer will rise sharply. I can tell the Minister that, among the plethora of reviews that have been undertaken by the Government, the tangled and now entirely historically based relationship between national assistance Acts, national health service Acts and community care Acts needs to be completely overhauled.

"half the population have only £200 or less in savings",—[Official Report, 17 March 1998; Vol. 308, c. 1102.]

There is something ridiculous about the conflict between the regulations governing people in residential care, those in long-term hospital care or those who are being looked after in the community. For example, a person in a private residential home probably has to pay for medication, but a person in a long-term national health service bed does not, although he may be almost exactly the same kind of person. The anomaly that the Bill tries to correct clearly points up the fact that the way in which we provide residential care needs to be wholly re-examined. Given a sufficiency of respite care and the ability to take it regularly, many elderly people could survive satisfactorily where they would prefer to survive—in their own homes. However, the elasticity of social services provision is so tight that that is now difficult to provide.

I also view with considerable concern the explosion in child care. Whatever my personal views about the sense of paying people to look after other people's children and denying the parents the kind of income that would allow them to look after the children themselves, which would be much better for them, the pool of carers from whom the elderly would expect support will be drained by an explosion in exactly the same kind of people being recruited into the rather more appealing task of looking after children. That will cause considerable anxiety to everybody in the field, and I hope that the Government are taking that on board.

There is another enormous difficulty and a real conundrum. For the past 75 years, we have encouraged people—by mortgage tax relief and a host of other devices, intended and unintended—to view their homes as their principal stock of value. That is not the case in many other European countries. In many countries of mainland Europe, people rent accommodation and keep their savings in some other form, but in Britain the biggest store of value is in the home. Many people have bought their houses with the specific intention of having them as stores of value against a rainy day, but when the rainy day comes, they have become so emotionally attached to what they no longer call a house but now call their home that they are deeply resentful of any suggestion of moving out.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: My hon. Friend raises an interesting sociological point. That was not always the case. My grandfather, who could probably have afforded to buy a house, never did and always rented accommodation off a large landowner, which tended to be the Harrow Trust or something of that nature. Such a system left people with free capital to look after themselves, which was much more effective than tying it up, as we tend to do now. Perhaps we should not be so ideologically attached to putting so much money into our homes and should try to encourage people to go in a different direction.

Mr. Pound: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Although I realise that the accommodation arrangements of the ancestors of the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Sir N. Lyell) are of extreme interest to him and his immediate family, what remote relevance has that to the matter under discussion?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I agree that we are going a bit beyond the scope of a Third Reading debate.

Mr. Rowe: I of course accept a rebuke, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but the fact is that the Bill seeks to set right an anomaly and, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Sir N. Lyell) has pointed out, there is some doubt about whether it will succeed in preventing local authorities from introducing various forms of informal rationing, which will be just as deleterious as the form of rationing that Sefton council introduced.

I am green with envy about this measure because I have never yet won any of the ballots in this House. I have given up subscribing to the national lottery on the basis that my experience in this place suggests that I shall never win anything anyway. I have never had a private Member's Bill in all my time here, so I am deeply envious, but the fact is that, although this is a useful tidying-up measure, the Government have to get a grip on the issue at its heart and have a real shake around because, otherwise, we will not succeed.

I give one further example. One of the reasons why local authorities are under such pressure that they behave as Sefton council behaved is local authority planning restrictions. Many of my constituents, and I myself, frequently applaud such restrictions but, when confronted with a particular dilemma, we start wondering about them. They make it difficult for 60-year-olds who want to look after their 80 or 95-year-old parent to adapt their home in ways that would allow the parent to come and live with them.

That is partly because polices such as the green belt—policies of which I am largely in favour—make it difficult to allow extensions to houses, but also partly because there is a residual, inappropriate anxiety among local authorities that, somehow, by improving their home in that way, members of the younger generation are enhancing the value of their houses, and should not be allowed to do so. That is a real difficulty.

The other great pressure on local authorities is that many of them, as we have heard already from many interventions today, have an extraordinary ideological hostility to private care provision. Quite honestly, the way in which local authorities of that persuasion delay assessments, so that a care home has to carry two or three empty beds, when it may be only a six or seven-bed home anyway, until it gets very near to ruin, or the way in which they manipulate the lists in other ways in favour of their own care provision, is an absolute scandal. It all goes back to the core problem: we have a set of contradictory views about the value of people providing for their own care.

Mr. Gray: Is that not particularly disgraceful when county council homes cost significantly more than the private homes that they are competing with, as is the case in Wiltshire? It is even worse when, as in Wiltshire, the county council announces that, ideologically, it is determined to continue to use its own homes unless those homes are sold. Even if they are then sold, they can be sold only to non-profit-making organisations. Is that not a disgrace?

Mr. Rowe: It is a disgrace and it should be made absolutely crystal clear that local authorities that behave in that way are diminishing the number of people whom they can afford to look after and so depriving needy people of care.

There is a real difficulty because people who have been frugal and provident all their lives and who want to provide for their own care and well-being in old age, are terrified of the future. If we cannot do anything else, I hope that the Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), will be able to give us some assurance—when he has stopped his private conversation—that, beyond the narrow confines of this Third Reading, the Government are seriously addressing the tangle that leaves so many old people, who have done all the things that we applaud in trying to create savings for themselves, in a state of fear, confusion and, in many cases, pretty miserable living conditions.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): I congratulate the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Singh) on introducing the Bill, which I thoroughly support. The one point on which I disagree with him is that he said that people do not deal with this subject with passion. On the contrary, at the Conservative party conference a few years ago—

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): Conservative party conferences are very passionate.

Mrs. Laing: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I made a passionate speech on this very subject. I found at the party conference that the vast majority of Conservative party representatives throughout the country entirely agreed with what I said. Therefore, I know that I must have been right. It was an excellent example of how democracy works in the Conservative party because, only a few months later, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer announced the changes in the appropriate legislation, which were outlined so well this morning by the hon. Member for Bradford, West. On that day, I urged the then Chancellor to change the limits that are applied when the financial situation of an elderly person is assessed in examining whether their long-term care should be funded by the state, or whether they should have to pay for it themselves.

Although I had the full support of the many thousands of Conservative party members who were there on that day in Blackpool, and the support to a certain extent from the then Chancellor who made those changes, the great importance of this subject to the lives of almost every family has not been fully recognised. It is unfortunate that there is a need for such a Bill, but the hon. Member for Bradford, West is brave and courageous in introducing it.

The need arises because of the disgraceful attitude of certain local authorities that have continued to employ a policy of envy against people who have worked hard, saved and built up their resources, which they are entitled to retain to pass on to their families. It is sad that some local authorities continue to disregard the wishes of the people in their local communities who elected them. Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray), I can commend my local council—Essex county council—on its attitude—

It being Eleven o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER interrupted the proceedings, pursuant to Standing Order No. 11 (Friday sittings).

London Underground

11 am

The Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. John Prescott): With permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I wish to make a statement about the London Underground.

The underground is part of the lifeblood of London. More than 800 million journeys will be made on the underground this year. London Underground has made great strides since the King's Cross fire 10 years ago. Its management systems have been overhauled, its employment practices modernised, and productivity improved. All that reflects great credit on everyone who has worked for London Underground, but, for many years, investment in the underground has simply been too low to ensure that the worn-out assets are properly replaced. Without the necessary investment, operational efficiency is constantly undermined by old and unreliable infrastructure.

For a very long time, funding plans for the underground have been chopped and changed every year, both under the Greater London council and under the previous Government. I might add that all Governments have been involved in making cuts in investment in the underground at different times. Our analysis shows that such uncertainty and short-termism generally increases the cost of completing the underground's investment programme.

According to London Transport, there is now an "investment backlog" of some £1.2 billion. Despite that, the previous Government in their last Budget announced sharp reductions in the funding available to London Transport for the next two years. Combined with the cost overruns on the Jubilee line extension project, those cuts led to London Transport's planned investment being cut by almost a half.

In our election manifesto, we rejected privatisation and we promised that we would implement a new concept—a public-private partnership—to modernise the underground, to safeguard its commitment to the public interest and to guarantee value for money to taxpayers and passengers. I can now tell the House how we plan to deliver on that commitment.

Over the past 10 months, we have undertaken a thorough and careful analysis of all the options for developing the public-private partnership. We have examined a wide range of options, and have taken advice from a number of expert sources, including financial and engineering advisers, the Health and Safety Commission, the passengers committee and London Transport itself. A summary of the key facts and analysis will be placed in the Library of the House. I also want to mention the expertise that my hon. Friend the Paymaster General has contributed to our work, along with his Treasury colleagues. Their support has been much appreciated.

Our solution represents an entirely new approach—a third way. It is not a privatisation—or even partial privatisation; nor is it an old-style, publicly funded nationalisation. It is a publicly owned, publicly accountable model to get the best from both the public and the private sector.

Our solution has three main elements: first, operation in the public sector; secondly, infrastructure investment in a public-private partnership; and, thirdly, an extra investment now. First, we believe that the operation of London Underground services should remain as a single, integrated entity. We are also convinced that the operations should be firmly and securely a public sector responsibility. The underground network, integrated ticketing, travelcard, the tube map and logo—all the key features of the underground system—are valued by tube users and will remain the responsibility of London Underground, acting in the public interest, publicly owned and publicly accountable. We are convinced that that will be best for reliability, safety and public confidence.

The second element of our plans is to involve the private sector by awarding one, two or three contracts to finance, maintain and modernise the underground's infrastructure. There will be a competitive bidding process. We shall seek expert advice on the best way to structure that competition, including the best length of contracts. We will choose the contractor or contractors and the set of arrangements that will deliver the best value for money. If the best value can be obtained by having a single contractor, that is what we will have.

The infrastructure contractors will be under an obligation to eliminate the investment backlog, and to maintain and modernise the underground's trains and other assets, such as track, signalling, stations and escalators. There will be a performance regime with incentives and stiff penalties. That way, the operating company will be able to ensure that the contractor performs to the required standards. The freehold ownership of the assets will remain with the public sector. At the end of a contract, the assets will be returned to the public sector, in a much improved condition.

The contractor or contractors will be responsible for financing the investment that the underground urgently needs. They will be free to borrow the sums needed from the private sector capital markets, and will not be constrained by the annual public expenditure plans. As a result, they will be able to use their capital much more efficiently. Their constraint will be a practical one of how much work can be done without causing unreasonable disruption to passengers.

I have already paid tribute to the hard work of the London Transport and London Underground work force. The fact that the system runs as well as it does is a tribute to their efforts and, frankly, their efforts alone. Most underground staff will remain employees of London Underground, but it will make sense for staff who currently work on the procurement, installation and maintenance of hardware—track, signalling, escalators and rolling stock—to transfer with their work to the contractors. All this will be subject to detailed future negotiations. A small nucleus of engineering staff will be needed in the operating company to administer the contracts with the infrastructure companies and to ensure that they deliver.

I am today writing to every member of staff in London Transport to explain our policy and the commitments we are giving to reassure them. I will place a copy of the letter in the Library. I want to reassure staff that the rights they have under their contracts of employment—covering pay, hours, union recognition, and so on—will be protected as we move into the new structure. Existing staff will continue to benefit from concessionary travel. We will work with London Transport, the London Transport pension scheme trustees and the Inland Revenue to ensure that staff have the right to remain in the London Transport pension scheme as contributing members.

We want to make a start on modernising the underground, in preparation for its return to the people of London. On 7 May, Londoners will vote in a referendum, in which they can choose to establish a strategic authority for Greater London to put it on a par with other great capital cities around the world. When the Greater London authority is established, the underground will, with the rest of London Transport, transfer to it. It will then be not only publicly owned, but properly accountable to the people of London, through the mayor and the assembly. Mrs. Thatcher nationalised London Underground: we will return it to the people of London. [Interruption.] That is a statement of fact.

Over the next two years, my Department will work closely with London Transport in restructuring London Underground and managing the transition to a public-private partnership. That will involve a lot of work, and I will meet London Transport very soon to agree a programme for implementing our plans. I will also look to set London Underground demanding efficiency targets to achieve over the next two years, before it transfers to the GLA.

London Transport already has extensive powers to let contracts of the kind I have described, but should any additional legal powers prove desirable, we shall invite Parliament to consider giving them as part of the legislative arrangements to establish the Greater London authority.

Safety is, of course, a top priority and we have already consulted the Health and Safety Commission. The commission has confirmed that it believes that it will be possible to implement our proposals in a way that maintains and develops the underground's safety performance. The Health and Safety Executive will take that work forward, and I am writing formally to the chairman of the commission today to ask him to advise me on the outcome as soon as possible.

Our proposals will take a little time to establish and deliver. However, during the period of transition, we cannot allow the situation to deteriorate further. Therefore, as the third element of our policy—thanks to the prudent management of our public finances in the past year, as indicated by the Chancellor in his Budget—I can now announce that the Government will be providing an extra £365 million over the next two years. That additional money is over and above the money that the previous Government planned to provide and will be used for core underground investment, preparing the public-private partnership. By promising London Transport that money now to spend over the next two years, it will be able most efficiently to plan its investment programme.

The additional money will mean that, in the two years from April, total investment in the core underground—including private finance initiative investment—will be £1 billion. The extra funding that I have announced will enable more investment projects to go ahead in the next two years. Such projects will enable us to perform additional track works on the Victoria and Northern lines; to convert the old Jubilee line trains for use on the Piccadilly line—with 10 new trains available by 2001—helping to increase the line's capacity by over 10 per cent; to replace about 15 more escalators, including ones at key stations; and to refurbish 30 stations.

Our public-private partnership plans are based on long-term investment programmes—worth more than £7 billion in today's prices—over 15 years, aimed at creating a first-class underground for London. The investment will bring further benefits for passengers, such as track and civil works to remove speed restrictions, leading to faster journey times; increased train service levels as new signalling systems are introduced; and refurbished and modernised stations.

It is, however, not enough only to have a modern, refurbished, underground: it must be available to everyone, including disabled people. That objective will take time to achieve, but I am asking London Transport to examine how its current plans can be accelerated by the extra funding that I have announced today. I want to involve disability groups in considering our priorities, and will begin with my own advisory group—the Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee.

Earlier this week, I announced our plans for a £21 million river boat service for the new millennium and beyond. Today, I am announcing our plans for a £7 billion investment programme over the next 15 years for the Underground. I want London to become a showcase for a modern, integrated public transport system. We have produced a radical, modern and imaginative solution to achieve that goal. I shall be proud to return the underground to the people of London. I commend our plans to the House.

Sir Norman Fowler (Sutton Coldfield): May I first question the manner of this announcement—on a Friday morning in private Members' time? I remind the Secretary of State that the House has been waiting for the statement for almost 12 months, as the underground is of importance not only to London but to the nation. By choosing a Friday morning for the statement, many hon. Members—as is entirely evident in the Chamber—have been excluded from asking questions on it.

The Government's proposals are an unsatisfactory and inadequate compromise. The Secretary of State has accepted the principle of privatisation for infrastructure investment—in total contrast to many of Labour's statements before the general election—but he is content for operations to remain as a nationalised industry, which almost everyone now thinks is an outdated and failed model.

Does the Secretary of State not accept that the split between the public and private sectors is almost bound to lead to in-built conflict, with the public-operated company blaming the private infrastructure companies when things go wrong? If that happens, will not the travelling public lose out?

Does the right hon. Gentleman not realise that one of the great advantages of privatisation is not only the possibility of attracting investment but the way in which it has successfully introduced private sector disciplines into the operation of old public sector organisations? Is that not the lesson of transport privatisations—such as the National Freight Consortium and Associated British Ports—which the Secretary of State personally opposed?

Can the Secretary of State say which of the models of privatised infrastructure companies he is aiming for? He said that he would accept that one company could run the entire infrastructure, but is that his preference—or does he prefer three separate organisations?

Will the Secretary of State make it clear whether the public money that he announced will go to the underground over the next two years will be new money—entirely separate from money that has already been announced in the Chancellor's statement—or is it money that was announced earlier in the week in the Budget statement?

We have always backed private investment. However, is there not a danger that the system announced today will prove to be the most expensive means of attracting private investment into the system? Will the Secretary of State therefore publish the consultants' reports and the options that were available to him? Will he tell the House today how much the Government have spent on those consultancy arrangements?

Is not the main trouble that the policy on the underground has been determined merely to meet the Secretary of State's aim of avoiding the Labour party's pre-election slogan about "wholesale privatisation"?

The prospect is that today's statement will bring us botched-up privatisation that will not serve the interests of the taxpayer or of London Underground staff, and that, above all, it will not serve the interests of the travelling public.

Mr. Prescott: Clearly the right hon. Gentleman has not fully understood the implications of the statement. First, however—to correct him—we have been in government for only 10 months, so he could not have been waiting for the statement for 12 months. Perhaps he was expecting us to take office earlier than we did—[Interruption.] I made it absolutely clear that we were rejecting privatisation—[Interruption.] May I answer the right hon. Gentleman?

Sir Norman Fowler: Why was the statement on a Friday?

Mr. Prescott: I will deal with that point. [Interruption.] Can we stop this sort of harassment? [Interruption.] Would the right hon. Gentleman like to huff again? It was a very powerful comment. I should like to deal with the privatisation issue, but I shall deal with the Friday point—I would not miss it out.

We made it clear that we would not privatise the underground, and that we wanted a publicly owned and publicly accountable railway. I think that I have justified that decision in my statement. I would not attempt—having been in office for only 10 months—to try to justify the previous Government's privatisation measures, especially when I am trying to deal with the effects of those measures, such as the channel tunnel rail link, the sale of the rolling stock companies and of Railtrack, and underinvestment.

I shall not go into the sorry history of privatisation as operated by the previous Government; that will be for another time. However, that history is not evidence that such privatisations are the best way forward, and we totally rejected it.

The Government have made the statement today because, as the Chancellor said, statements will be made as a consequence of the Budget. Statements were made on Wednesday and on Thursday, and, today, we are taking the opportunity to make another one. I agree that the underground is a national issue, but it is very much a part of the interests of Londoners and of London Members—as we can see by the number of London Members in the Chamber for the statement. Today was a proper time to make the statement. Moreover, on Monday, I shall be involved in Brussels in negotiations on the Kyoto agreement.

Competing demands are made on the time of Secretaries of State, and I apologise if a Friday statement has caused any inconvenience to hon. Members. Nevertheless, it is quite proper for the Government to have made a statement on Friday. I do not think that Londoners will worry whether the statement was made on a Monday or a Friday—they will just be pleased that someone now has a future and a vision for London Transport, which is what I shall now deal with.

The right hon. Gentleman asked whether our proposals on splitting the underground would cause conflict. The advisers have told us no; as I said, the reports and the analyses of the reports are in the Library. The private sector can make a contribution by providing capital, but our proposals will not result in privatisation.

Although private capital can be invested—and we shall seek such investment—we believe that the model that we have chosen will be the best way of ensuring that taxpayers get the best value. That is our judgment. Once people examine the advice that we have received, and listen to the debate that will follow my announcement, they will make their own judgment. No doubt there will be debates in the House on the Greater London authority Bill and the changes that we may well have to make to meet those requirements, but, at the moment, our judgment is that it is the best way to proceed.

The right hon. Gentleman asked whether I believed that there should be one contractor or three contractors. If I can get the best value out of one contractor, that will be the best way to proceed. However, the choice through competitive bidding of one, two or three contractors will allow us to make a judgment on the best value. It is called the competitive bidding process, and I did not think that it would be challenged by the Opposition. Once we have received the bids, we shall make a judgment; that is the best way to use the taxpayers' resources. We want to get the best value and provide a good underground system.

The right hon. Gentleman asked whether new money was involved. As I said, £300 million of the £365 million was included in my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's statement of £500 million over three years. We have also taken into account money that London Underground was holding back because of the cuts in its investment programme imposed by the previous Administration. If we include the PFI, we shall now be able to invest something in the order of £1 billion over the next two years. The £360 million or so also takes into account the cuts that would have been imposed on London Underground by the previous Administration. It is extra money and it will be very welcome.

I do not believe that it will be the most expensive way to proceed. Checks and balances will be built into the negotiations. It is an excellent opportunity for London Underground. It is a publicly owned and publicly accountable solution, but, above all, it will give Londoners the chance to have a decent underground system.

[Mr. Prescott]

Mr. Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington): I welcome the additional funding that has been secured for the next two years. Will the Deputy Prime Minister clarify how much of the additional £365 million will be spent on privatisation consultancy fees? Will he confirm that safety will be a top priority if Railtrack is successful in bidding for the infrastructure? After all, just over a month ago, Railtrack was criticised for persistently failing to resolve poor track conditions.

Does the right hon. Gentleman believe that an opportunity has been missed to introduce environmental taxes such as congestion charges, which could reduce pollution in London, as well as giving Londoners a first-rate underground?

Finally, does the Secretary of State believe that Londoners will be prepared to wait at least 15 years for the misery on London Underground to be addressed?

Mr. Prescott: I am starting immediately by investing the extra resources. One of the major constraints will be the speed at which we can implement the investment programme without causing massive disruption on the underground. It is a matter of that, just as much as it is a balance of resources. We are investing the money that London Transport says that it requires, and I am aiming to provide the resources. The hon. Gentleman mentioned 15 years. It will take two years to negotiate the contracts and I have already announced the money.

The right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) asked how much was being spent on consultancy fees. We have spent only about £100,000 on such fees, but, considering the sums of money that are involved, it is only right that we should take proper advice. Although it will not be the hundreds of millions of pounds that were involved in previous privatisations and the selling off of under-valued assets, we do not yet have an estimate of how much the contracts will involve. I shall have to discuss that with London Underground. If there are one, two or three companies that will make a difference to how much is involved. Having established the principles in the statement, we will now need to enter discussions with London Transport.

I do not know who the bidders will be or whether Railtrack will be one of them. We shall wait for the bids, examine them thoroughly and consider which will provide the best value.

As to whether we might consider parking charges, environmental taxes and so on, such matters are part of an integrated transport system. We shall publish a White Paper which will address those issues. We are dealing with the problems on the underground immediately and in an effective way which will be welcomed by Londoners.

Mr. Keith Hill (Streatham): First, may I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the sheer scale of the new investment that he is negotiating? This settlement has secured for Londoners a tube system of which they can be proud for a generation. Secondly, I congratulate him on the excellent deal that he has secured for the travelling public. I also welcome the assurance that he has offered the staff of London Underground that their present pay and conditions will be sustained, as will their pension provisions for the future.

Thirdly, while we very much welcome the commitment of private contractors to the partnership, will my right hon. Friend confirm that there will be tough sanctions for any shortfall in services that they pledge to deliver?

Mr. Prescott: I thank my hon. Friend for his words of support. I have made it very clear that staff conditions are extremely important, particularly given that previous privatisations often robbed them of their full benefits and pensions. We do not intend to make the same mistake.

We are clear that there will be tough sanctions in the contractual obligations in respect of the investment programmes. We are doing everything that we can to avoid the mistakes that were made in previous privatisations and were the reasons why we rejected privatisation. Public accountability will mean just that, and public ownership means that we shall have a stronger sanction in making sure that the contracts work.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): While I join my constituents in Pimlico in thanking the Government for their investment in the Victoria track to address the recent problems, how far will today's announcement improve the signalling defects that have bedevilled London Underground in recent years and, in particular, have held up the Jubilee line extension? Given that there is a limit to the number of questions that we can ask on such occasions, will he promise an early debate, perhaps in Government time?

Mr. Prescott: I should certainly like to have a debate on the matter, but that is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. I shall certainly pass on the right hon. Gentleman's comments.

I shall be discussing with London Transport the many investment priorities. Signalling is extremely important. The right hon. Gentleman mentions it in regard to the Jubilee line, but, to be fair, London Transport was not to blame for the failure in the signalling system; it was the fault of a private company that did not live up to its contract to produce on time. These things can happen in public and private companies. Nevertheless, we want to establish a proper order of priorities, and signalling is very important.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his statement will bring great pleasure not only to Londoners, but to all those who use the grossly overcrowded tube system? It is clear that he has learnt many difficult lessons from the privatisation of British Rail, and I hope that, when the time comes, he will ensure not only that the companies maintain the high contractual obligations that he intends to place on them, but that the public are able to register their approval or disapproval in adequate terms.

Finally, it must have been a pretty incredible team of engineers that built an underground system that is still going after more than 100 years.

Mr. Prescott: I thank my hon. Friend for her support. She is quite right. I have always been impressed by the sheer scale of disinvestment in the underground system that had continued for decades and the sums of money that were required to replace track, bridges, tunnels and so on. It needed something more radical than reliance on the Treasury to provide resources from year to year, as that can change under different Governments, as we all know.

We have learnt a great deal from previous privatisations, and we shall take that into account in the contracts. We shall make it clear that we shall need tough contracts. As for the public having more of a say in the running of the London underground system, that is an important point and I shall say more about it at a later date.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it is important that the contractors are given the opportunity to be bold in the works that they will need to carry out? Such is the scale of the work required on some of the lines that it may be important for parts of those lines to be closed completely for a time to allow the contractors to deal with the problems in one go rather than on a bit-by-bit basis. Does he accept from all those who use the tube in London that if he succeeds in pulling this off, we shall want to have him stuffed and put in the British museum?

Mr. Prescott: Presumably that will be after I have died! The hon. Gentleman raises a serious point about how such a programme can be implemented. I said earlier that there are probably more constraints on the implementation of the programme than on the availability of capital resource. We shall consider that at length. Work can be undertaken during the night on the underground. However, we shall have to choose whether to close an entire unit to get the work done faster in the long run or to do it in bits and pieces. As we have seen from the motorway network, tackling a job in bits and pieces can result in a lot of trouble. We shall do our best to deal with the problem.

One of the advantages of the London system is that, because transport is still publicly owned and integrated, we can ensure that buses and trains work together to secure the maximum movement for people and the least disadvantage from whatever programme we implement.

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow): May I thank my right hon. Friend for the new investment coming soon to the Victoria line, which I use every day? I should be grateful if he would clarify a detail about the contracts. He has talked about £7 billion of investment over 15 years. Does he envisage the contracts running for the whole of that period, particularly if there is a single contract? I appreciate that value for money will be the key to deciding whether there will be more than one contract. If there is more than one, will lines be put together, or might there be more than one contractor on a line?

Mr. Prescott: Those are matters for further discussion and negotiation with the contractors. My hon. Friend has raised some real problems, to which we hope to find the best solutions. I cannot give an effective answer yet.

My hon. Friend welcomed the investment programme. It is possible because the Treasury gave us new money, against the cuts that had already been imposed on the underground. That is an important reason why we shall be able to get on with investment. When the previous Administration made a statement to the House. a cut of almost 50 per cent. in investment was envisaged because the Treasury thought that if the system was to be privatised—a policy to which the previous Government were committed—the money was not needed at that stage. We have taken a different view. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has found new money for investment so that we can pass on an improving system to the people of London.

Sir Nicholas Lyell (North-East Bedfordshire): We shall want to study the complex plan carefully. Under the public-private partnership, who will take the tricky decisions on manning levels and fare pricing?

Mr. Prescott: The same people who are taking those decisions now—London Transport. There has been a 10,000 reduction in the work force, with increasing numbers of people using the system and a considerable increase in productivity. The same people will be in control. That is why it will be publicly owned and publicly accountable.

Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North): As my constituency includes 10 tube stations, I greatly welcome my right hon. Friend's statement. I hope that some of the investment may be available to deal with the persistent signalling problems on the Bakerloo line and with Ladbroke Grove station, which is literally propped up on stilts.

Does my right hon. Friend agree that the London public will favourably compare the pragmatic, partnership-based investment approach to the underground with the dogmatic approach to privatisation of the Conservatives, who made such a mess of the privatisation of the former British Rail?

Mr. Prescott: I shall leave it to the people of London to make their judgment about that. Every hon. Member has a point to make about their local line. They all have problems of disinvestment. London Transport has estimated the total at £1.2 billion. I am not covering all that, but I am making a start. We hope that the programmes that we plan in the contracts for 15 years and beyond will deal with everybody's problems, because we want a modern tube system that meets the needs of London and the tremendous investment needs of more than £7 billion.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Is it not remarkable that, after years of rhetoric in opposition and a policy hiatus of 10 months in government, the Secretary of State has come to the House to give a statement that perpetuates uncertainty rather than clarifying the future of London Transport underground? Is it not highly unlikely that contractors will take on a 15-year infrastructural lease unless they can impose exceptionally high charges to recoup their investment on such a short leasehold?

How will the right hon. Gentleman avoid political interference in the management of London Transport underground if the board is to be appointed by the Greater London authority, as the Labour manifesto proposes?

Mr. Prescott: London Transport will be accountable to the assembly and the mayor. The previous Government subjected its investment requirements to one and two-year considerations. In the proposals that I shall negotiate before it is handed over, we shall secure long-term stability in the investment programme. That will result in considerable efficiency gains. If an investment programme lasts for only one or two years and nobody knows what the third year will hold, the capital is not used efficiently. I am advised by people who should know that the new structure could result in considerable gains in efficiency and resources. We shall wait and see. We shall negotiate on those issues. I am advised that 15 years will be adequate. People are already queuing up for the contracts, so I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's advice on that.

As for uncertainty, of course the new third way of a public-private partnership raises many questions. We have rejected privatisation and are going for a new formula that will give us the best of both worlds. If the previous Administration had taken a little more time on some of their privatisation deals, the taxpayer would have been a lot better off.

Mr. Tony McNulty (Harrow, East): Will my right hon. Friend ignore totally the curmudgeonly nitpicking from the Conservatives and the pre-pubescent whining—on time, rather than money, on this occasion—from the Liberal Democrats? Will he take it from me, as an outer London Member, that suburban commuters will welcome his statement? It is long overdue. The only lasting question that my constituents will ask is when they can get on with it and have the improved tube with a stable future that London deserves.

Mr. Prescott: I can tell my hon. Friend: they can get on with it now. That is what I have told London Transport.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton): The Deputy Prime Minister has told the House that there will be £7 billion more investment over the next 15 years. Will he explain further how he has arrived at that figure? When the previous Government presented their proposals on public industries, they told us that their measures would produce billions of pounds of extra investment. We were often left waiting for that investment. Why is the right hon. Gentleman so confident about the figure of £7 billion?

Mr. Prescott: That is the assessment of the consultants and London Transport. They are well aware of how much investment is needed. The calculation is easy. They have said that there is £1.2 billion of disinvestment that should have been dealt with years ago. The average consideration is that £500 million or £600 million a year should be invested in the underground system. The £7 billion comes from the consultants' calculation, which has been agreed by London Transport. I have taken that as a proper figure.

Ms Margaret Hodge (Barking): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the one thing that Londoners sought from a new Labour Government was a modern, efficient, safe underground system? Does he agree that, with £500 million of new investment over the next two years and £7 billion over the next 15 years, we are setting about achieving that? Will he assure me that, in the regulatory framework that he sets up to administer the new system, he will ensure that fares remain affordable to Londoners?

Mr. Prescott: Of course fares are important, although whatever the fare, it is difficult to get on the underground at the moment. The top priority is to secure investment so that there is extra capacity for people to travel. To encourage people to use their cars less and use public transport more, it must be comfortable and accessible. Our programme is geared to achieving that.

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire): Given the copper-bottomed financial guarantees that the right hon. Gentleman seems to be offering, and therefore the low level of risk, why are the arrangements to be outside the normal public sector borrowing rules? I realise that he may want the Paymaster General to answer that question, but perhaps he will have a go.

Mr. Prescott: This deal shows the constraints of public sector borrowing. London Underground has had to compete for resources against hospitals, schools and all the areas in which people think there is a higher priority. By adopting this private sector initiative, we will be able to use the assets and the income stream from London Transport operations to guarantee payments for long-term investment. That is normal in other countries; it is only in this country that we have chosen to operate differently. That is why other countries have better public transport systems than we do.

Mr. John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington): I am sure that my right hon. Friend agrees that, having sat on the Government Benches listening to report after report of privatisation scandals in recent months, it beggars belief that anyone could urge wholesale privatisation of London Underground. However, he will be aware that a number of us favour wholesale public ownership of London Underground and would therefore welcome assurances that contracts will be under continuous review, so that if they fail, he will intervene directly, as he has elsewhere, to return contracts to public ownership and control.

We must now seize the opportunity to install new management in London Underground, which involves representatives of the work force, passengers and the community as a whole, accountable to the new strategic authority for London and committed to providing a public service and protecting our environment.

Mr. Prescott: I understand my hon. Friend's point about public ownership, but, looking back over the years, as an advocate of it, I realise that one of its great disadvantages is that it is subject to Treasury control. That has meant that services received insufficient resources. I do not think that that is in any doubt any more or a difference between parties. Even under the Greater London council—with which my hon. Friend was involved—there was a failure to get resources for investment, which was at half the level of that achieved by even a Tory Administration some years later.

My concern is to ensure adequate levels of investment. I do not think that we are likely to get that under the PSBR and Treasury rules at the moment. I have enough to say about those on other occasions. I am a practical politician; I want investment for London Underground, and I have chosen to provide it. It will be publicly owned and publicly accountable. Indeed, the assets will still be owned by London Underground and will be returned. There is no need to worry about that. They are owned by the public sector. The contracts will last for whatever period is negotiated in order to achieve the investment, and, when they are finished, assets will be returned to the London authority.

On staff, management and labour, make no mistake that the process will propose many changes. There are not just easy options. The work force and the management will face a challenge. We will, of course, start proper discussions with them about how we implement the programme, now that I have made the statement.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): Does the Secretary of State agree with the excellent comments and analysis of his hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone) on the radio this morning? Will the increase in finance that he has announced today bring the level of public money going to Londoners per head up to the level going to Scots per head?

Mr. Prescott: I did not hear the comments of my hon. Friend, but I have heard about them. I think that he has gone to Scotland to talk to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer about the matter.

Mr. Martin Linton (Battersea): Will my right hon. Friend reassure my long-suffering constituents who use the Northern line that the end of their misery is in sight and that there is a light at the end of a very long tunnel—at one point, the longest tunnel in the world—especially as they were the first to suffer from the postponement of the track and signalling programme, which was postponed until 2005 as a direct result of the £300 million cut in the previous Government's last Budget presented by the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke)? Will he ensure that everything will be done to relieve their misery and give priority to track works on the Northern line as part of the £365 million package that he has introduced?

Mr. Prescott: That was the line on which I used to travel from Clapham, and it was an uncomfortable experience at peak time. [Interruption.] I think that Conservative Members will find, if they go and have a look, that Clapham is on the underground. Travelling from there was most uncomfortable, and persuaded me more of the need to consider capacity and not simply prices.

Conservative Members endorsed the Northern line privatisation, where private money was involved—and it was a complete mess. We must offer people using the Northern line a better opportunity for the future. We must do so not only on the Northern line but for the whole London underground. In 10 months, we have produced a plan to enable us to achieve that.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): I think that the Deputy Prime Minister said that he was to take powers to determine matters over the next couple of years before the Greater London authority materialised. Although I am sure we all accept that his entrepreneurial flair will mean that those powers are used benignly and helpfully, is not there a contradiction in giving extra powers to the Government and the Secretary of State—and his successor—which could count against the very development work and the use of private sector enterprise that he is trying to introduce?

Mr. Prescott: It is a bit rich for a member of the previous Administration, who wanted completely to privatise the underground, to talk about powers. I said in my statement that if it was necessary, in the negotiation of the contracts, to amend some of the legislation, we would do so. At the moment, London Underground has the powers. We will be looking at a Greater London authority Bill. That will give everybody an opportunity to discuss the extent of the powers and any changes that we feel it might be necessary to include.

Ms Linda Perham (Ilford, North): I thank my right hon. Friend for taking the time to get this right. My constituents rely on eight Central line stations, some of which were under threat by the previous Government's all-out privatisation proposals, and they will welcome the proposals. The Central line has taken over from the Northern line as the misery line, mainly because of signalling problems. I look forward to the Central line, along with all the other lines, being improved under the proposals.

Mr. Prescott: It is that sort of change that we envisage in the investment programme.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): The right hon. Gentleman said that the investment will lead to faster train times, but, in the list of expenditure that he has given us, nothing is said about signalling. For Leicestershire and other midlands constituents who come to London and use the Northern line, are not improvements in signalling the key to faster train times? Will he give some undertaking about signalling?

The right hon. Gentleman referred to the river boat service and proposed new services. Is it not a fact that the river boat service that was introduced some years ago has not been a success? How will he make the new service a success?

Mr. Prescott: I mentioned signalling a number of times in my statement and in answer to questions. I mentioned some improvement in the first stage of investment and the £1 billion that might do something for signalling. The real improvements will come with the £7 billion investment programme. Signalling is absolutely critical to faster trains, as is improvement of track. That was in my statement, and I invite the hon. Gentleman to read it.

There have always been problems with the river boat service. The uncertainty on the river undermined the previous systems. We are introducing more piers, which will mean more pick-up points. About four or five new piers on the river will enable more pick-up places, which are designed to integrate with the bus and underground system.

With the millennium exhibition, more people will want to travel on the river. That will provide an opportunity for sustained demand. If we can fit the service into the integrated transport system, with common, integrated ticketing, another advantage will be gained. I believe that the service will be a legacy of the millennium dome, and will not go the way of other services, which have not had sufficient funds to continue.

Mr. Clive Efford (Eltham): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his announcement. Does he agree that one of the pleasures of having a Labour Government is seeing the faces of Conservative Members who know that they should have made such statements in their 18 years in government, but were too tied up in the dogma of privatisation to be capable of doing so? Will he give a guarantee that targets set in any contract that he lets in the new programme will not leave London underground users open to the spectacle of any operator receiving a bonus for providing a lower standard of service? My right hon. Friend will be aware that under the bargain basement sell-off of British Rail, that is exactly what resulted from privatisation. Will he guarantee that the service will not suffer under private sector involvement in the future plans for London Underground?

Mr. Prescott: I do not think that we will make the same mistakes that were made with rail privatisation, because we are not following the same policy and it is not privatisation. For example, the operator will be publicly owned. It will determine the service and run it—as happens now—until it passes to the GLA in two years' time.

On the point about the competence of contractors, the usual process will be followed and there will be penalties, which will be rigidly enforced. However, I have no reason to think that that might be necessary. We will go to the negotiations and see what we have to agree to get the necessary investment.

With regard to the service, that will be our responsibility for the first two years until we pass it over to the GLA. Then, Londoners will make their own decisions on service, through their assembly and the mayor of London.

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): I am sure that the Deputy Prime Minister is aware that one of the problems with PFI projects is that they generally attract higher costs for servicing the capital raised, compared with Government borrowing.

The right hon. Gentleman said earlier that he was looking at the possibility of congestion charging in London—he referred to parking charges, but I think that he meant that in the wider sense—and put that in the context of an integrated transport policy. Is he considering how much money could be raised as a charge on congestion or parking in London and what proportion of that would be used to finance the new capital needed for London Underground, as a quasi-public sector contribution to the PFI exercise?

Mr. Prescott: The hon. Gentleman will have to wait for the White Paper to see our judgment on those important issues, which require careful consideration and consultation. We are putting together the White Paper and we want to include those issues in our consideration of an integrated transport system.

The hon. Gentleman said that the costs of servicing capital raised through the PFI would be higher than for Government borrowing. That is true in the sense that the Government can always borrow more cheaply, but we do not always have the resources available to do that. We must also take into account the fact that if we do not invest properly, the cost of disinvestment is very high indeed. If we put that disinvestment cost into the equation, and if long-term investment from the private sector can be guaranteed, the PFI may be a cheaper option in the long run.

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): May I join other Londoners in warmly congratulating my right hon. Friend? Does he agree that it is a bit rich not to have a warm reception from Conservative Members, in view of their legacy of under-investment and the privatisation and cheap sell-off of public assets?

Can my right hon. Friend give me some reassurance about the sophistication of contracts for the private sector? Will they ensure that the evolution of public transport in London—especially guided buses, trams and the possibility of road pricing technology—will be part of an integrated system for the capital? Will the contracts take into account such changes in transport and the environment?

Mr. Prescott: Those are most important issues, and they are an essential part of any integrated transport system. I hope that, through the investment in London Underground and the plans that I have announced for river services, we will have a showcase for integrated transport. That is my intention, and more will be said about that in the White Paper.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): The Deputy Prime Minister said that there would be a £7 billion investment in London Underground over 15 years, of which £2 billion would be invested over the next two years. That leaves a £5 billion gap, which, presumably, the right hon. Gentleman expects the private service operator to fund. In order to get a return on that huge sum of money, will not fares inevitably have to rise substantially over and above inflation over the next 15 years?

Mr. Prescott: First, I did not say that £2 billion would be invested over the next two years; I said £1 billion. The £7 billion relates to the contracts that we will let after two years, once they have been negotiated. We are saying that £7 billion investment is needed to modernise the underground system, and our advisers tell us that there is no difficulty with that. It is not simply a matter of a fare increase. There has already been a tremendous increase in the number of people using the tube. If we can achieve greater capacity, that will bring more money to the underground system. The money does not necessarily have to come from fare rises. Greater efficiencies in the system could contribute to the final solution.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon): May I tell my right hon. Friend how welcome his announcement will be to my constituents who have suffered the vagaries of the Northern line for far too long? In particular, they will welcome the restoration of the track modernisation programme, which was postponed by the previous Government.

Will my hon. Friend be considering the computerised control system at Euston, which is way out of date, and the modernisation of stations on the Northern line, especially Colindale where there are even holes in the wall?

Mr. Prescott: We are all well aware of the difficulties and the obvious signs of disinvestment in the underground system. One consequence of the decision by the previous Administration to cut the investment programme for London Underground by almost 50 per cent. was that London Transport had to hold back some of the extra resources that it had planned to invest. That meant that about £100 million of investment was cancelled. I have now carried over that money from this year and added it to the £1 billion I announced. We can now get on with dealing the problems that were not dealt with previously because of the mishandling of the finance programme by the Conservative Government.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): May I welcome the right hon. Gentleman's enthusiasm for the use of the River Thames as a means of transport, not least because it will mitigate the absence of an underground system in north Battersea? I hesitate to trespass on the constituency responsibilities of the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton), but, as a former resident of Battersea, I can confirm that we noticed the absence of an underground system, so we would very much welcome a river service there. If the right hon. Gentleman can ensure that north Battersea gets one before too long, a great many people will be grateful.

Will the right hon. Gentleman say more about the corporate structure of the new London Underground and about the split in responsibilities between the chairman or chief executive of London Underground and the future mayor of Greater London?

Mr. Prescott: I am grateful for the hon. and learned Member's comments about river services. I am sure that everyone looks forward to the development of the river, as it will unite the two banks, so that there is no longer a separation in the transport system.

On the point about corporate structure and management, we will enter discussions with the parties involved to come to a decision about that. It is clear that there will be changes throughout the system, in one form or another. However, the hon. and learned Gentleman will have to wait to know more until I have had further discussions.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman could explain a little more about the relationship between what he is proposing and any decisions that may be made by the GLA and the elected mayor two years hence. What scope will they have to revisit the issue of privatisation of the operation of services across London Underground?

Why has the right hon. Gentleman set his face against the privatisation of services? He advocates integrated transport policies, and there are many commuters into and out of London who want integration between train operating companies on the former British Rail network, with the potential to run services in and across London. That is an example of integration that the right hon. Gentleman appears to be frustrating today.

Mr. Prescott: Public opinion now is even more overwhelmingly against privatisation of the underground than it was before the general election. It made the previous Administration extremely nervous about privatisation. The evidence clearly shows that privatisation is not the way forward, and the advice we have had from consultants has confirmed that.

Privatisation of the underground would involve two or three years preparation and then, if we followed the policy of the previous Administration, selling it at a knock-down price. As it is such a disinvested system, why should we want to sell it now? That would be robbing Londoners of their previous investment in the underground system. This is the best and most practical way to modernise it—using the £1 billion, which I have mentioned, until the GLA takes over, and then using the £7 billion to get on with really modernising it. That is the best, quickest and most practical way of modernising the system so that it can be maintained and passed over to the people of London in a better state. That justifies it being publicly owned and publicly accountable.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. I am sorry to disappoint some hon. Members, but we must return to the main business: the Community Care (Residential Accommodation) Bill. Mrs. Eleanor Laing had the Floor.

Community Care (Residential Accommodation) Bill

Question again proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

11.59 am

Mrs. Laing: I should have liked to say something on behalf of my constituents in Epping Forest who depend so much on the underground, but I shall instead take up my speech where I left off. I was speaking on behalf of my constituents and expressing their concerns about the method by which they may or may not have to pay for long-term care.

Essex—unlike Wiltshire, which my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire described earlier—has decided to sell nursing homes into the private sector in order to raise capital to improve them and to provide greater resources to look after people who need care in their later years. I warmly welcome that decision: it means that resources will be used more efficiently. Let us hope that the county councillors of Wiltshire learn something from the county councillors of Essex.

I join other hon. Members in paying tribute to the various organisations that have helped to bring the Bill before the House, notably Help the Aged and Age Concern.

It is an important point of principle that people who work hard and save throughout their lives should not be treated unfairly compared with people who spend their earnings as they get them. It is not surprising that many people feel that they have been disadvantaged because they have worked hard, saved, put their money into their house, wanting something to pass onto their children and grandchildren. That is a perfectly respectable and understandable human feeling.

It is not surprising that many such people resent the fact that a person living next door might have, for example, not bought his council house and instead simply continued to pay rent, not put any of his own resources into looking after his house or his community, not spent money on his family, not taken any steps to save and therefore had plenty of money to spend during his earning years, only to have his bills paid for by the state. Such a situation is patently unfair and widely recognised as such.

My main worry about the effect of the policy of certain councils on people approaching their later years arises from the anxiety in which those people live because of their fear of losing their homes. A home is not just an asset or a financial figure on paper; it is very much part of a person's life and of a family's life, especially as people approach their later years.

About one in five—a large number—of older people find that they have to go into residential accommodation. Professor Hamnett, of King's college, London, in his paper, "Inheritance in Britain: the Disappearing Millions" has estimated that, in recent years, 40,000 homes have had to be sold in Britain in order to meet the costs of long-term care.

We must go further—I hope that the Government will consider the points that I have made and go further—than the Bill suggests. I hope that they will create incentives to encourage people to save by means of pensions and other savings schemes so that they can pay for their own residential care, should that become necessary, and protect their own homes and family assets.

Mr. Tredinnick: My hon. Friend refers to some important statistics. Has she looked at other statistics on the number of elderly people going into residential care? Can we be sure that the figures are accurate, and on what basis does she make her assertions?

Mrs. Laing: I am relying on the figures of Professor Hamnett of King's college, London. I have read other studies. I cannot give my hon. Friend statistics here and now, but I am pretty certain, having examined various academic studies on this subject, as well as figures from Government Departments, that the figures to which I have referred are close to the reality of the situation.

Vast numbers of people are concerned about paying for residential care. It is partly a good-news story: so many more people are going into residential homes because, happily, people are living longer. Many of them can have a good standard of living when they go into residential homes. I am sure that we all welcome that, but there is a problem in paying for such care. It is unfortunate that the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not take up any of those issues in his Budget statement earlier this week. It should be incumbent on the Government to take steps to encourage people to make provision to pay for themselves when they go into residential care.

As I was saying before my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick) made his excellent intervention, Conservative Governments over 18 years created a property-owning democracy of a sort never seen before in western Europe. Conservative Governments gave everyone the chance to own property and to take part in what has become known as the cascade of wealth—[Interruption.] Labour Members mock, but, in talking about wealth, I do not mean riches. I mean the little nest egg that everyone in Britain now has the chance to build up for himself and to pass on—I cannot understand why Labour Members mock this idea—to their families. That is an integral part of family life stemming from general ownership of property.

Mr. Grieve: Does my hon. Friend agree that if more wealth cascaded down the generations, the balance of the need for residential care, as against the ability of families to look after their elderly relatives, might change?

Mrs. Laing: My hon. Friend makes a good point. I shall have to consider it more deeply before I can say whether I utterly agree with him. I certainly agree with him about encouraging the cascade of wealth.

I do not know why the Minister mocks the idea. I am talking about wealth, not riches. The House will understand that I am talking about the small nest egg, to which everyone is entitled if he or she has worked hard and paid tax on earnings.

I thoroughly support the principle that lies behind the Bill. When people put the money that they have earned and paid tax on into their own homes, their homes should be protected as far as possible and as far as the Exchequer and the Department of Social Services can afford. The Bill goes some way to help people when they most need it.

It is interesting that clause 1 applies to the National Assistance Act 1948 and clause 2 applies to the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968. Clause 3 explicitly states that clause 1 should extend to England and Wales only and that clause 2 should extend to Scotland only. The Bill proves that the House—this Parliament, the House of Lords and the Commons put together—is capable of making legislation for England and Wales, and for Scotland, taking into consideration two different legal systems and the different legislation that is in force in the two different parts of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Pound: On another point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sorry to trespass on your good nature, but the hon. Lady is guilty of deviation to the extreme on this occasion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: So far, I have found the hon. Lady to be in order, but I shall listen carefully to what she has to say.

Mrs. Laing: I am speaking precisely to the very words on the Bill. I do not believe that I am deviating at all. It is an important matter. The House is perfectly capable of making legislation—such as the legislation that will result from the Bill—that applies to different parts of the United Kingdom in slightly different ways but which has the same force. Therefore, my point is that a Parliament in Scotland and an assembly in Wales are unnecessary.

12.10 pm

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): I shall be extremely brief. I shall make one point on a subject about which we are all concerned: reducing the anxieties of the elderly.

The present Opposition have on the whole been more generous in letting private Members' Bills through at half-past Two on Friday afternoons. This debate constitutes a first opportunity to speak on the Bill. Bills such as this always represent a quarry to which people can return after the event.

I have paid Sefton borough council the compliment of seeking to understand its logic. Its concern was partly with those who had made prior arrangements for themselves. Such arrangements can include purchasing a flat in a wardened block. My brief speech is based on the experience of a member of my family and the distress that selling one's home always occasions to those who go into residential care. If this obliges me to declare a personal but academic interest, I am happy to do so.

The relevant member of my family bought, at the age of 84, a flat in such a block which, I understand, was regarded as the best block in the town. I shall not embarrass the public company that built and marketed the flats by identifying it, but I gather that that process constitutes its business. When my relative died five years later, it was clear that the resale value of the flats was less than 50 per cent. of the value at which they were originally marketed, and that was in an era when the housing market, with improvements in the economy, was in much better shape than it had been five years previously.

Because of her death, my relative mercifully did not have to go into residential care, but the trauma of selling one's home is enormously exacerbated if private arrangements for not depending on residential care—a subject in which Sefton evinced an interest—lead to so dramatic a loss of capital value. Help the Aged has been congratulated on its help in preparing the Bill and in drawing attention to this subject. It should also be warmly congratulated on setting up a national marketing scheme for the resale of such flats to make up for the failure of the contingent arrangements of the public company's programme.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): I am happy to be able to participate briefly in the debate. I can see the look of relief that has come across the Minister's face after hearing that information.

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Ian McCartney): It is unusual for a barrister to be brief.

Mr. Grieve: Barristers can be brief. Indeed, one feature of being a barrister is that, because we are in front of a judge who can pull us up short—with perhaps even greater promptitude than you do, Mr. Deputy Speaker—which encourages brevity, we sometimes make skeleton arguments. If the Minister wants me to elaborate on that, I shall take longer.

The Bill is to be commended. The hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Singh), who introduced it and has steered it through the House, has undoubtedly done a considerable service.

It is interesting to note a change in the approach of Labour Members towards legislation of this kind. To be fair to Sefton borough council, although I cannot think of a good word to say about its conduct in this matter, it was simply applying a strictly financial approach without regard to the emotional suffering that it might cause elderly people in cleaning them of virtually all their assets before it was prepared to step in and help. It is interesting and noteworthy that the Bill marks a change, in that Parliament is setting a benchmark in saying that it is important that elderly people in reduced circumstances, but who nevertheless have saved up capital assets, should be able to keep some measure of those assets when the local authority steps in to help them because they are in need of care. I believe that that is right.

I made a point to my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing), who is no longer in the Chamber, about encouraging the cascading of wealth down the generations, by which I mean that people should be able to pass on some inheritance to those who follow them. That is important in setting up a nexus society that may ultimately reduce the need for institutional care. It encourages the younger generation to look after their parents and grandparents wherever possible.

It is clear that the Bill will not get round the problem of rogue borough or district councils failing to assess whether a person is in need of care and attention. I hope that that simply will not arise. The spirit of the Bill is clear. If it were to arise, the possibility of seeking judicial review would always be present.

I now come to my final remark. The Minister will have to accept that I have made probably the briefest speech in the debate. The Sefton case is an interesting example of judicial intervention in regulations. It is noteworthy that no hon. Member has criticised the way in which the Court of Appeal came to its decision either for its logic or for the fact that the decision embodied not only legal but moral considerations. We are considering the incorporation of the European convention on human rights. It is sometimes said against the convention that human rights are a political matter on which the courts should not be able to pronounce. The Sefton case illustrates that the courts are often required to pronounce on matters that have a political dimension and they generally succeed in doing so without difficulty and without causing an excessive number of ruffled feathers among parliamentarians in this Chamber.

I reiterate my thanks to the hon. Member for Bradford, West for introducing the Bill. It is reasonable, it is short and it has commanded support on both sides of the House, which is what I have always been told a private Member's Bill ought to seek to do. It deserves to be given its Third Reading today.

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North): I reiterate the apology made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Singh) for having to leave early. The reason he left says less about his respect for the House than about the length of post office queues in Bradford. He would not have left if he had had any alternative.

My hon. Friend asked me to spend the 24 hours before this morning's debate studying all available documentation on Sefton borough council—actuarial tables and details of the Acts, byelaws and judicial decisions affecting it. I have spent all night poring over tomes and volumes in anticipation of telling, forensic points reaching me from the Opposition Benches. I am relieved, perhaps grateful and possibly disappointed that Opposition Members' comments tended by the minute to be less and less to do with the subject that we are debating. We have heard about the effect of petrol duty on rural gas guzzlers, an exegesis on the Bradford wool trade and we have even wandered off into the byways of the national lottery. If these are friends of my hon. Friend's Bill, Lord protect me from my friends.

We came eventually to passion and the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing)—an association that many of us in the House would make. She referred to the passion that the Bill should engender. In conversations with my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West, I detected his passionate commitment to this vital issue and I hope that hon. Members detected it in his speech. To right a wrong is one of the noblest reasons for seeking election to the House. My hon. Friend's Bill would right a wrong; would that all of us could say at the end of our time here that we had achieved as much.

I am delighted to wind up the debate on behalf of my hon. Friend. I have not had to respond to telling speeches from Opposition Members: most of them were supportive, if a little discursive. I strongly commend the Bill to the House and to the nation.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): I apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Singh), the promoter of the Bill, for not being present for the opening speeches. I came down from Shropshire this morning and, foolishly, thought that the statement by the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions would be made first.

I strongly congratulate the hon. Member for Bradford, West on the Bill. I have a little experience in this area and should declare an interest. In 1907, a cottage hospital was built in Ellesmere by Louisa Jebb, sister of Eglantyne Jebb, the founder of Save the Children, to serve the needs of a small rural community. It was confiscated by the state when the national health service was created in 1947 and included in the round of 13 cottage hospital closures in Shropshire in 1987. The concept of the time was to concentrate NHS efforts in large district general hospitals such as those in Telford and Shrewsbury.

There was extraordinary local reaction and I became involved in the local campaign. Ellesmere was the last hospital to close, although it had only 13 beds. The Under-Secretary looks puzzled, but I am bringing the matter up to emphasise the intense feeling in small towns in rural areas about retaining facilities and keeping people near to where they live. There was fierce hostility to elderly people going to Telford or down to Shrewsbury and blocking up high-tech beds when they would have been much better kept at home.

Mr. Boateng: What has this to do with the Bill?

Mr. Paterson: I strongly support—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are going wide of the Third Reading debate. The hon. Gentleman should not try to turn the debate into a general discussion of the health service.

Mr. Paterson: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was giving background information, because I must declare my interest. I became involved in the action group that formed a trust and raised £250,000 to buy the hospital and another £250,000 to refurbish and run it as a nursing home. I was deputy chairman of the trust and chairman of the management board that ran the nursing home until I was elected to the House.

That involvement gave me a great deal of experience, and I strongly support the Bill. I could cite numerous cases of elderly couples being forced to separate, such as a couple in the first intake into the nursing home. The lady had to go into the home because of infirmity and the husband was left on his own. They were separated for a traumatic 18 months until she died. He had run down the family finances to pay for her stay in the nursing home and ultimately had to sell their only asset—their house. He also ended up in the nursing home.

The Under-Secretary is kindly listening intently. Will he address the inflexibility of the current rules, which was picked up on by my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe)? From 6 April 1998, the Department of Social Security will contribute £318 a week to a person's nursing care; £333 a week to the care of elderly mentally infirm people; £213 a week to low dependency people and £247 a week to high dependency people in residential care; and £262 to the care of elderly mentally ill people.

We should consider the couple I mentioned. I put it to the Under-Secretary that the money would be better spent on home visits by carers. A visit by a carer to a private home costs £5 an hour. An agency might charge £6.50 an hour. Three visits might be made daily. An overnight stay might cost £5 an hour for nine hours, which is £45 a night.

My arithmetic may be wrong—perhaps it should be corrected by an education Minister—but if I am right the total would be £462 a week for a couple. Surely the best reason for spending that money would be to keep couples together in their own homes. Nevertheless, I strongly support the main drift of the Bill—the aim of raising the threshold to £16,000 so that couples are not split.

I should like, finally, to take up a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing): I think it important to ensure that assets are kept in a family and that they can be passed on to the next generation.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): I am delighted to have the opportunity to say a few words about the merits of the Bill. First, however, let me echo the remarks of those who have welcomed the initiative taken by the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Singh) in introducing it. Any of us who have ever piloted a Government Bill through the House will have found it a fairly challenging experience; to take on a private Member's Bill and steer it through all its processes is a remarkable task, and the hon. Gentleman has performed it with distinction.

The hon. Gentleman is possibly one of life's pessimists. He said that he would be unable to stay because he was opening a post office. I see from his entry in Dod's that he has a majority of 3,877—considerably larger than my own majority. I should have thought that he would not feel it necessary to open a post office, but he clearly sees things differently. That is fair enough, and we all understand why he cannot be here.

As a number of hon. Members have already pointed out, there seems to be a feeling abroad that it is strange that a number of my hon. Friends want to examine more closely a Bill which, so far, has gone through all its stages without any real debate. I think I am right in saying that one organisation with an interest in the subject was slightly concerned that the Bill had been objected to formally on an earlier occasion. That happened, of course, to ensure that it would be debated. [Laughter.] The Under-Secretary of State for Health obviously thinks that, if the people have spoken, there is no need to scrutinise legislation. That is an interesting idea, but it is profoundly undemocratic. My hon. Friends and I are deeply wedded to all the principles of democracy, one of which, surely, is that a proper debate should take place.

I shall say more shortly about what the consequences would have been if the matter had not been debated. First, however, let me offer a cautionary tale to hon. Members, and also to people outside who have been concerned. Another measure went through the House with all-party agreement—very quickly, as I recall. That was the legislation relating to the Child Support Agency, which is directly relevant to today's Third Reading. The fact that the legislation was agreed by everyone meant that it was not scrutinised.

There cannot be a Member of Parliament who has not found—from his postbag, in his constituency surgeries or perhaps in the case of his friends and relations—that a good idea that was not sufficiently scrutinised has turned out to be a nightmare in practice. I hope that the Minister will, in due course, join me in saying—after all, he is a fair-minded man on occasion—that this is an excellent Bill, but one which needed scrutiny.

There is another aspect to the Bill, which makes it slightly strange that it has received such a welcome. To an extent, it is retrospective legislation. Normally, the House would not approve of that. At first sight, not many people would feel very comfortable about the idea that a court can come to a settled view and Parliament can simply overturn that view. The fact that that has been done in this instance—and, as I recall, both Front Benches pledged themselves to introduce legislation to reverse the effect of the second judgment—says something important about the underlying principles of the Bill, and about what Sefton really meant. The underlying theme that the Court of Appeal ultimately had to deal with in Sefton was the narrow point—important to the person concerned—about an elderly person's resources being run down in a fairly callous way. That opened up the debate about the state's share of paying for the welfare of the elderly and the role of the private citizen. That debate underlies the Bill and Third Reading.

We cannot begin to assess the Bill's merits and deficiencies, to which I shall return, without addressing the conflict between what the state pays and what an individual should pay. That problem has been inherent and implicit in the welfare state since its conception. It is only fairly recently that the conflict has entered the public domain and has caused the problems that were encountered in Sefton. There are two reasons for the conflict. First, people are living a great deal longer. That is sometimes thought to be a problem for society but as somebody who intends to live for a long time, that concept is fine. However, it has some implications.

In the period between 1951 and 1996, the number of 65-year-olds increased by about 60 per cent. while those over the age of 75 increased by 136 per cent. That is a success story and we all hope to aspire to that, but it carries implications for society. We must take into account the fact that people are living much longer. There is another important but. People nowadays have vastly more resources: there is evidence of that on the Government Benches. At one time, money to leave to one's children was the province of the fairly wealthy. As a result of 18 years of Conservative government—[Interruption.] An hon. Member mouths, "We are all Tories now", but I do not accept that.

After 18 years of Conservative government an increasing number of people, who once upon a time would have died after a long and worthwhile life and left nothing to their dependants are living a great deal longer. They have assets to leave behind and they do not want the state apparently to welsh on its deal.

Underlying Sefton and implicit in some of the submissions to it, was the idea that in some way the state—the local authority, call it what we will—was reneging on a deal. That deal was accepted to be, erroneously as I shall show, that when people reached old age, having paid national insurance contributions, they were entitled to be looked after for ever and a day, whether care was needed for one year or three years, or whether people lived to the age of 100 or beyond. The problem with that is that it is based on the false premise that, having paid national insurance contributions, people have paid for care in a nursing home, a retirement home or a hospital.

Mr. Boateng: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Nicholls: I shall gladly give way to the Minister.

Mr. Boateng: The hon. Gentleman is talking about the legacy of a Government in which he played a small, brief and not particularly distinguished part.

Mr. Nicholls: The hon. Gentleman indulges in these petty brushes to try to assert a radical agenda. I was delighted to play an all-too-brief but extremely significant part in the previous Administration. I shall deal with it in due course in my autobiography, and I shall give the hon. Gentleman the opportunity to read it so that he may know my contribution.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. Let us now return to the Third Reading debate.

Mr. Nicholls: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was led astray, although I should not have been, by the Minister. I should have known better.

Sefton illustrated that the concordat between the citizen and state simply breaks down and it is for this reason. There is no doubt that what gave the applicant the moral right in the Sefton case to say, "I have paid my dues over the years. Now I should be supported," was whatever national insurance contributions had been made during that person's lifetime, but it is not the moral obligation that matters in the end. It is who is going to pay for that person's care. The trouble with national insurance—and it never ceases to amaze me how little this is understood in the public at large—is that it is not a funded scheme.

The level of health care that people receive depends not on the amount of contributions that they will have paid in their lifetime, but on the taxpayer's ability at the time they need it to fund that level of care. We have an increasingly growing and aging population, so more and more people are going to depend on the state's largesse and fewer taxpayers are going to be there to discharge that obligation daily.

Mr. Pound: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Nicholls: I will give way in just one moment. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for conceding by his intervention that I am making profound points to which he wants to refer.

The problem that society will have to face is that there will simply not be enough money by conventional means to discharge the state's obligation.

Mr. Pound: I was waiting for the hon. Gentleman to draw breath before I intervened, but, as there seemed little likelihood of his pausing, I interrupted him. He made a remark earlier that Labour Members were mouthing the expression, "We are all Tories now." Having done a quick consultation with the massed ranks of the honest democratic socialists who sit around me, may I say that not one of us will admit to having said anything even remotely like that, so, for the sake of the record of the nation, will he either withdraw that remark or attempt to pin it on someone?

Mr. Nicholls: The hon. Gentleman has made a contribution that has been noted by the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland), the Government Whip, and an off-message remark. I will not get taken too far down that road. The hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Pound) has wrecked what might have been a promising parliamentary career. I compliment him for his bravery. The interesting thing that one should mention is that the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry, the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney), described himself as a socialist Member of Parliament on his headed notepaper before the last election.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I repeat what I said earlier: can we now please return to the Third Reading?

Mr. Nicholls: I am sorry. This is the problem about taking interventions and I must apologise for it.

Going back to the Sefton judgment, there was no great surprise that the matter was going to come before the courts in due course because of the underlying problem about how the state discharges its responsibility to those within its care.

There is another reason why, to an extent, the Sefton judgment was not at all surprising. I wondered whether my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) was going to go on to that point. He said that, in the debate so far, we had not examined in any great detail the way in which the Court of Appeal had handled the judgment. There is something in that.

Mr. Garnier: I know that my hon. Friend was listening intently to my remarks earlier, when I intended to do precisely that: to analyse what the Court of Appeal had said. Unfortunately and perfectly correctly, Mr. Deputy Speaker advised me to return more closely to the Bill. Although I had a desire to analyse the judgment, unfortunately, the rules of the House prevented me from doing so.

Mr. Nicholls: It is clear that my hon. and learned Friend and I are, as it were, at a crossroads in relation to that point. Whereas he was moving away from the point in hand, I am moving towards it.

The interesting thing about the Court of Appeal's judgment was that this problem had not arisen before. If one considers the words of the statute, one is bound to ask why some inventive council had not looked at section 22 of the National Assistance Act 1948 and said to itself, "This is the sort of thing that we might be able to exploit," if I can put it like that, "to be able to avoid our responsibilities." When preparing for the debate, I was interested in the fact that there had been no attempt to use that provision.

It is obvious from the judgment—and I refer to the report of it by Lawtel—that the Court of Appeal was dealing with the age-old problem of deciding where it wanted to be and then plotting the course to get there. The judgment concluded:

"It was clear from the evidence that Sefton accepted that the applicant, Mrs Blanchard met its own threshold requirements as a person in need of care and attention. Notwithstanding this, what it was seeking to do was to say that because of its lack of resources it was not prepared to meet the duty which was placed upon it by the section. This it was not entitled to do."

When one sets that ruling in the context of the facts and the judgment as a whole, it is clear that the Court of Appeal was saying that it would not put up with the implications of the Sefton case and would do its level best to deal with the problem.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: My hon. Friend makes a point that is highly pertinent to the Third Reading of the Bill, in which we are approving of the Bill's effect, as far as it goes, but are seeking to clarify where that leads us. In the Court of Appeal judgment, Lord Woolf says that the local authority

"was not entitled to do that. Once the authority was satisfied that Mrs Blanchard was 'in need of care and attention' unless it could rely on the words 'which is not otherwise available to them' it was under an obligation to fulfil its duty and a lack of resources was no excuse."

The point that is so relevant to Third Reading is that the local authority—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This intervention is far too long.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: May I conclude my point?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Very, very briefly.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: The question is whether the Bill will cover the point exposed by Lord Woolf.

Mr. Nicholls: No, it will not, and my right hon. and learned Friend is correct. The Bill will also not cover another point. Sefton sought to exploit the provision on resources in section 22. My reading of the Bill is that it contains nothing that would stop an unscrupulous council, under the earlier part of section 22, refusing to make an assessment until the person's resources had been wound down to such an extent that the exercise would become otiose.

Mr. Boateng: No.

Mr. Nicholls: I hope that the Minister is prepared, when he winds up, to do more than say no and to address the points that have been made by solicitors, barristers and Queen's counsel sitting on the Opposition Benches. If those points are not addressed, we will have produced a Bill that we all welcome—we will pat ourselves on the back for having done the job that we are sent here to do—but we will have failed. Scrutiny is necessary, and we had to have a Third Reading not to hold matters up, but to ensure that when the Bill is enacted—as I truly hope it will—it is in a fit and proper state. In my short remarks, I hope that I have played my part in flagging up for another place the fact that the Bill is good up to a point, but that much more would could be done on it. We look to the Minister not to indulge the petty brutalisms that he so much enjoys, but to answer the debate. If he did so, it would be the first time that I have heard him do so, but it would be a refreshing experience.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Paul Boateng): Prevarication and delay are part of the armoury of Opposition. Having listened to Opposition Members today, I see that they have not yet learnt how to use that armoury as effectively as they might. They have certainly chosen an inappropriate target. Right hon. and hon. Members who attend the House on a Friday will have noticed, on previous occasions when the Bill has come before the House for consideration, that objection has been made time and again by Opposition Members. It is no wonder that the innocent onlookers who have written to the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) have suggested that some Opposition Members perhaps wish the Bill other than well.

Mr. Gray rose—

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Boateng: No, I will not give way to the right hon. Gentleman. He has objected in the past to the Bill without giving reasons for doing so, and there is no need for him to give reasons now.

Mr. Gray rose—

Mr. Nicholls: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Boateng: No, I shall finish my point. Conservative Members know very well what has been going on in the Bill's passage. The correspondents of the hon. Member for Teignbridge smelt a rat, but they—the innocent onlookers—smelt the wrong animal: they should have smelt a fox, because that is what has been behind the delay and prevarication characterising—

Mr. Gray rose—

Mr. Nicholls: Will the hon. Gentleman give way now?

Mr. Boateng: No; we have to move on.

Mr. Nicholls: Will he give way?

Mr. Boateng: No. The hon. Gentleman will have plenty of time, but not quite now.

The delay and prevarication—I will be the first to say it—has taken some amusing and entertaining forms. If one has nothing better to do with one's time, it might even have been quite pleasant to watch on the cable channel that devotes itself to such matters.

Mr. Garnier: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Boateng: But it would be a sad person who had nothing better to do.

Mr. Garnier: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman heard you,

[Mr. Garnier]

Mr. Deputy Speaker, allowing me to make a point of order, which is this. The hon. Gentleman has had the Floor for three or four minutes and has yet to address himself to the Bill's content. I wonder whether I could ask you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to persuade him to do so, not least because he has made some abusive—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Those are entirely matters for the Chair to decide.

Mr. Boateng: I am much obliged, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was doing Opposition Members the courtesy of responding to them. Perhaps I was misguided, and should have ignored them completely by ploughing on? No, I wanted to show them—especially the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier)—the courtesy of giving them a response. In this debate, the hon. and learned Gentleman has been his usual, elegant self—I refer more to his figure of speech than to any other aspect of his presentation—treating us to a useful tour de force on the case. In its way, that was quite helpful. I am not sure that it progressed the debate very far, but it was elegantly done.

Other speeches were less elegant, but raised points that were undoubtedly of interest to those making them. If they were mined with a certain zeal, they might even provide something for local newspapers, as they frequently seemed to have some sort of constituency content. However, one or two points made in the debate deserve a serious response. I should like, very briefly, to tackle those.

There is a real issue, which is of the utmost importance and seriousness, which is why all hon. Members owe my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Singh) a debt of gratitude in raising the issue in the House. We particularly commend the role of Help the Aged and others in bringing some relief to those who suffered from the actions—or apprehension of possible action—of Sefton borough council and from the uncertainty surrounding the subsequent case.

Safeguarding a set amount of capital is of considerable importance to anyone entering residential or nursing home care and their families. Most people entering such care are very elderly and vulnerable and have saved all their lives to prepare for their old age. The Government certainly believe that we owe it to those senior citizens to protect a modest amount of their life savings and/or proceeds from the sale of the family home from being swallowed up entirely in care home fees. That can matter so much to older people, for whom being able to pass something on to their families or having a small nest egg for a rainy day is a source of pride. We do not refer to that as a cascade of wealth; it is the modest outcome of a life of prudence which ought to be recognised and rewarded, and certainly ought not to be penalised in the way it was by Sefton's actions, which, by taking away the last small amount of savings, threatened self-respect, independence and a sense of self-worth on the part of vulnerable individuals. We are determined that that should be protected. Indeed, that is why we welcome the Bill, and I am glad that my Department has been able to be of some assistance to my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West, as he graciously recognised. That is why I can give an assurance to Opposition Members who raised some concerns as to whether the Bill would achieve the purpose for which it was intended. I feel sure—and there is no reason to believe otherwise—that this modest and uncontroversial measure will achieve the purpose for which it was intended.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: I am grateful to the Minister, and I am encouraged that he feels sure that the Bill will succeed. Do I take it from him that he believes that this short Bill deals not merely with the narrow point in the Sefton case, but overcomes the rather broader case that I highlighted earlier so that, in future, a local authority will not be able to get out of its responsibilities by telling elderly people that they must spend any savings between £16,000 and £1,500 on home helps, for example, before they can be taken into residential care? Will the Minister clarify his view on that?

Mr. Boateng: I am happy to do just that. As Opposition Members will understand as many of them were in government at the time, although we maintain that it has always been clear that the intention of the policy was to do just that, if we left the Court of Appeal's judgment to stand on its own, there would always be the danger that some local authority would seek to use the law—either by leapfrogging the Court of Appeal and asking the House of Lords to revisit the matter or by some other ingenious attempt to get round what was a fine and useful judgment on the part of a distinguished court, as the hon. and learned Member for Harborough said—to thwart what we maintain is the intention of Parliament and what we understand to have been the policy underpinned by the decision of the Court of Appeal.

We already apprehend—which is why we welcome the Bill—from anecdotal evidence provided by Help the Aged and Age Concern that some local authorities are seeking to ignore the capital limits by using waiting lists, as the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Sir N. Lyell) suggested they might. That could result in elderly and disabled people being forced to enter residential care to spend any capital savings below the limit of £16,000 to pay for their care. That is why we felt it necessary to ensure that that should not happen by writing it into the law, as the Bill does.

The Bill makes clear the policy intention that anyone entering residential accommodation should be able to retain a nationally set amount of their capital, as determined by Parliament. Clause 1 amends section 21 of the National Assistance Act 1948 so that local authorities will have to disregard a person's capital up to the limit set out in the regulations when considering whether care and attention are "otherwise available" to them. That meets the point raised by Conservative Members, while retaining Parliament's right to review the £16,000 limit, which should not and will not be fixed in stone. That is important.

We are satisfied that the Bill serves a modest but useful purpose. My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West is to be congratulated on bringing it before the House.

We all understand why he is unable to be with us as the Bill reaches its final stages. The House has given the Bill a thorough investigation and runaround.

Mr. Nicholls: Examination.

Mr. Boateng: It certainly cannot be said that the Bill has passed without examination. All reasonable points have been satisfied. We wish the Bill well and a speedy entry into law.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Employment Rights (Dispute Resolution) Bill [Lords]

As amended (in the Committee), considered.

New clause 9

MATTERS PROVED ON EVIDENCE BEFORE THE TRIBUNAL

'.—In proceedings brought before tribunals established under the Employment Tribunals Act 1996, issues in dispute between the parties shall not be treated as if proved, or not proved, unless the Tribunal concludes that they are so proved, or not proved, on the basis of the evidence presented to the Tribunal.'.—[Mr. Lansley.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

12.56 pm

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 1, in clause 6, page 4, line 39, leave out from beginning to end of line 45.

Mr. Lansley: We shall have further opportunities to congratulate the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Healey), but I do not want to proceed without thanking him on behalf of all those who support the Bill for the time, trouble and expertise that he has brought to steering it through the House. Lord Archer of Sandwell introduced it in another place, where it underwent constructive discussion and amendment. It has been amended in Committee and we now have the first substantive opportunity to discuss some issues that arise from it. I hope that we can do that crisply and effectively, without undermining its cross-party support.

The new clause and the amendment would provide that when employment tribunals have to decide matters of fact or issues presented to them, they will conclude that those issues are proved, or not proved, in the light of the evidence presented to them and, as is customary for such tribunals, on the balance of probability. The central principle is that the balance of probability—not proof beyond reasonable doubt—is a proper test in a dispute between parties.

In some circumstances, which I shall touch on briefly, the Bill and other legislation dealing with disputes brought before employment tribunals—as they will be renamed—undermine the principle of neutrality between the parties, imposing obligations on the employment tribunal to regard certain matters as assumed or to be judged not on the balance of probability but as proved unless the contrary is established. That is to undermine what ought to be the basis of justice that many people perceive when they present their disputes dispassionately to be decided in a hearing.

That will occur, for example, under the National Minimum Wage Bill, which will bring a substantial new class of actions before tribunals. The Bill requires employment tribunals to make several assumptions, such as that a person making a complaint be regarded as qualified for the national minimum wage, and that a person making a complaint that they have not been paid the national minimum wage has indeed not been paid it. In such circumstances, the Bill requires employment tribunals to assume that the complaint is proved unless the employer is able to establish the contrary. A decision will not be made on the evidence or on the balance of probabilities. I shall not dwell on that, because we have had the opportunity to debate the merits of that provision in other legislation.

It would be much to the advantage of the employment tribunal system generally if tribunals were required under this Bill always to examine issues of fact, and make decisions not on the basis of assumptions or bias but on the balance of probabilities and in the light of evidence presented.

I am afraid that there have already been several instances where such a principle has been undermined. For example, under both race and sexual discrimination legislation, it is assumed that complaints are effectively proved unless the employer is able to assert otherwise and refute the complaint with evidence to the contrary. The new clause would not undermine cases presented to employment tribunals even in such difficult and often vexatious circumstances, because there is nothing to stop employment tribunals drawing inferences from the evidence, as long as to do so seems, on the evidence, to be justified and the employment tribunal is able to exercise its judgment on the balance of probabilities.

If the employment tribunal is to make a general assumption about the conduct of employers or circumstances in which racial or sexual discrimination might occur by inference rather than on specific evidence or context, it is entirely possible for the employment tribunal to continue to apply presumption, but to do so not as a response to legislative injunction that it should, effectively, be biased, but on the basis of evidence and the probabilities that it assesses. By their very nature, tribunals rest on the judgment not only of lawyers but of lay members.

Under the Bill and related national minimum wage legislation, the operation of tribunals is moving towards the reflection of the burden of proof directive, which the Community is wishing on us, such that employers will be regarded as engaging in sexual discrimination unless they can prove the contrary. That seems a pretty damaging presumption.

Amendment No. 1 relates precisely to that point, but is concerned with a very particular instance. Clause 6(3) refers to circumstances where somebody makes a complaint about the refusal of an employer to deduct union dues that relate to a political fund contribution. Where such a complaint is made, the employer would have to satisfy the tribunal that the reason for not making such a deduction was connected to matters other than the duty to deduct the political contribution. The employer has therefore to prove the contrary of the assumption made in the legislation. Amendment No. 1 would delete such an assumption.

The purpose of this group of amendments is to touch on the issues surrounding burden of proof and to try to establish in the Bill, in a more concrete way, that the intention is that parties should bring their disputes before a tribunal on the basis that it will exercise a neutral principle—that of examining a case on the basis of the evidence presented. We must disapply some of the other provisions in the Bill that would result in employers being regarded as guilty even before the evidence has been presented and proved.

On that basis, I commend the new clause and the amendments to the House.

Mr. John Healey (Wentworth): I welcome the debate on new clause 9 and amendment No. 1, but not the reasons that lie behind them. The tabling of 10 new clauses and more than 50 amendments suggests that the purpose of Conservative Members is to impede rather than to improve the Bill. That has less to do with this Bill and more to do with another Bill which, like a will-'o the-wisp, will disappear before their eyes next Friday.

What will not disappear is the widespread desire for my Bill—as it stands, without new clause 9 or amendment No. 1—to reach the statute book. The Bill has had a long gestation and very thorough pre-parliamentary consultation—including on the question of burden of proof before tribunals, which is the subject of the new clause and the amendment. Employers want the Bill, unions want the Bill, the Tribunal Service wants the Bill and the 100,000 people who, by the year 2000, are projected to put cases to tribunals, need the Bill.

I was impressed by the genuine interest in and the strong level of support for the Bill, including on questions covering burden of proof, that I found in personal discussions in the run up to the Bill with the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux, the Trades Union Congress, the Confederation of British Industry and the new president of the Tribunal Service, Mr. John Prophet—who, I am happy to say, hails from Yorkshire and was previously regional chairman of the Yorkshire tribunal service. All understand that the Conservative party supports the Bill. Today will be a test of that support—a test of whether Conservative Members mean what they say or whether, as the early signs suggest, they are more interested in manoeuvres to delay the Bill than in helping employers and individuals to get a better system for settling disputes and differences.

New clause 9 has its roots in the National Minimum Wage Bill. It may help hon. Members if I briefly explain the background. There are few hon. Members who are as familiar with that Bill as the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley). Clause 28 provides, for the purposes of the National Minimum Wage Bill, that an employee is a worker unless the employer can prove otherwise. It also provides that it is presumed that an employee is being paid less than the national minimum wage unless the employer can prove otherwise.

In Committee and in the House, during the long hours of debate on that Bill, the Opposition spoke to a number of amendments they had tabled to probe the issue. I fear that the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire is returning yet again to the subject. It is surely sensible that the burden of proof should rest with employers. After all, it is the employer who has access to all the information and proof necessary to show the tribunal that the person is a worker and how much he is being paid. It is the employer who holds all the necessary information about remuneration, national insurance records and pay-as-you-earn. It is the employer who is responsible for the contract of employment.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham): If it is a question of an employer not deducting union contributions, surely the employee, of all people, would know whether or not his wages included that deduction.

Mr. Healey: The hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) and his hon. Friends start from a misapprehension about the nature of the burden of proof. We are not talking about a presumption of guilt or culpability; it is a question of who is best placed to settle a dispute about the facts, one way or the other. Surely it must be right that the party with access to information should have responsibility for proving its validity. Surely that approach makes common sense and is practical and correct. It does not contain the in-built bias to which the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire referred or any presumption of guilt before proceedings get under way.

Mr. Lansley: I shall not replay the whole argument, but does not the hon. Gentleman recall that the national minimum wage legislation makes it clear that all the information in the hands of the employer can, by law, under pain of penalty, be taken out of the hands of that employer and given to an enforcement officer? The employer does not have the only access to the records and information.

Mr. Healey: That is correct, but the source of information is the employer. In such circumstances, it makes practical sense for the employer to hold the principal burden of proof where facts are disputed.

It is not simply the national minimum wage that is at stake here. New clause 9 would affect the way in which tribunals operate in a number of other cases. Contrary to the assertion of the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire, under current legislation, in most cases tribunals require one of the parties to prove his case to them; they require one of the parties to undertake the burden of proof.

Usually, that burden of proof rests with the employee. For example, in unfair dismissal claims, it is for the employee to prove that he is an employee and that he has been unfairly dismissed. However, in certain limited circumstances, that burden rests with the employer. For example, under section 98(1) of the Employment Rights Act 1996, it is for the employer to show the reason for a dismissal and that it falls within one of the reasons under which dismissal is justified. If the employer satisfies those requirements, under section 98(4) of the same Act it is for the tribunal to establish whether the dismissal was fair or unfair. On the ground of reasonableness, the burden of proof in that case is neutral.

I have given three examples of the range of burden of proof under current legislation. Essentially, it is a way of directing the tribunal's attention to the most appropriate source of information. I dwelt on that issue and have perhaps given a fuller explanation than was needed in the hope of anticipating and answering questions that Conservative Members may have on the new clause. The burden of proof proposals in the Bill are the same as those contained in the legislation produced by the Conservative party when it was in power and which were put out to wide consultation in 1996.

Amendment No. 1 makes changes to clause 6, which deals with cases where a worker alleges that his employer has wrongly deducted a political fund contribution or has wrongly refused to deduct union subscriptions from pay. The purpose of the clause is to transfer the jurisdiction for such hearing cases from a county or sheriff court to the tribunal. That is its only purpose. Since the Trade Union Act 1984, when, as Conservative Members will know only too well, the current law on political funds was established, it has been for employers to prove that any refusal to deduct union subscriptions was unconnected with the action of a person to withdraw from paying the political levy.

In other words, it is for the employer to prove that his intentions and motives are in accordance with the law. Amendment No. 1 would remove a long-standing arrangement. It would, in effect, shift the burden of proof on to the worker. It would be difficult, therefore, for the employee to divine his employer's motives or underlying intentions. It would make it difficult, if not impossible, for a worker to prove such a case. That cannot be reasonable.

Neither new clause 9 nor amendment No. 1 has my support or the Government's. I hope that Conservative Members will seriously consider not pressing either the new clause or the amendment.

1.15 pm

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): I do not want to detain the House for very long, but I want to highlight some of my concerns. When I first read the new clause of my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), I was minded not to support him, not least because I found it somewhat difficult to cope with the English. If I may say so, I consider the clause to be inelegantly drafted. I hope that my hon. Friend will not take that as a personal criticism.

I fully understand the purpose behind the new clause. Having listened to what my hon. Friend had to say in explanation of it, I am more persuaded to accept the arguments that lie behind it. I am not convinced by the argument of the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Healey). I congratulate him, of course, on bringing the Bill before the House. I am not yet convinced that his argument on the burden of proof meets the legitimate concerns expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire.

I fully accept that there are different types of case where the burden of proof may rest on the plaintiff, the complainant or the respondent. In some instances, the position is neutral. Under the current system, the law accepts that the burden of proof is not a static concept.

I suggest to the hon. Member for Wentworth and to my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire that, by and large, in civil cases—let us for present purposes assume that employment tribunals are related to civil and not criminal law—the tribunal is not too fussed about where the burden of proof lies. It is far more interested in the evidence and how that evidence can be applied to the relevant law. With great respect to both the hon. Gentleman and to my hon. Friend, I do not intend to get too hung up on where the burden of proof should lie in any given dispute. I believe that the courts are capable of assessing what is important and what is not and reaching a fair and just conclusion.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire is right to point out through his new clause the creeping movement away from placing the duty on the person making a complaint to satisfy the court that his complaint is made out. I accept that in continental jurisdictions, especially when dealing with criminal law, the defendant—the accused person in a criminal case—must satisfy the court that he is innocent before the court will be prepared to acquit him. That is not our tradition. Our tradition is worth investigating to see why we have it, and it is worth examining before we overturn it wholesale.

I fully accept that the hon. Member for Wentworth is not seeking wholesale to overturn the system that we have come to respect on the burden of proof. However, I urge caution on the House. The new clause highlights—and clause 6 amply demonstrates—yet another example of where the burden of proof is moving away from the person making the complaint to the person who is required to answer it. We must remember that the complainer is a volunteer. He is the one who brings the proceedings. He brings the machinery of law to bear. It is the defendant, the respondent or the employer who is there, as it were, involuntarily. It is unjust that an involuntary party to a dispute should have to deal with the burden of proof.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): It seems to me that the amendment proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) is otiose. I wonder whether I can get some free legal advice from my hon. and learned Friend, as he speaks with great knowledge on these matters. The definition in the "Oxford Companion to Law" says:

> "The basic rules are that a party asserting an affirmative must prove it, and that a party relying on a fact peculiarly within his own knowledge must establish it. The onus of proof may shift at various stages in a case."

Nothing in the Bill as drafted goes contrary to what is in the "Oxford Companion to Law".

Mr. Garnier: I know that there is a tradition at the Bar that we help each other out, but I am certainly not giving my hon. Friend any free advice. I am not sure whether the point he makes assists or hinders our discussion. Unless the Bill makes it clear, the usual rules will apply.

Clause 6(3) specifically says that it falls on the employer to satisfy the burden of proof. There is an express change in where the burden of proof lies.

I fully accept that, under the current law that deals with the recovery of assets of criminals who have already been convicted of drug crime, the burden is on the convicted criminal to demonstrate that what he owns or what he has is not the fruit of any criminal activity.

The constitutional difference is that that man has already been convicted. I think that I am right in saying that the convict, having been convicted under the traditional system, whereby he is innocent until proved by the prosecution to be guilty beyond all reasonable doubt, has to demonstrate that his assets are not the fruit of criminal activity. [Interruption.]

I am not sure that the mutterings from Ministers are terribly helpful, as they may not be well informed. If the Minister cares to respond on behalf of the Government Whip, I am happy to be corrected.

The hon. Member for Wentworth dealt with section 98 of the Employment Rights Act 1996. He is right, but all he demonstrates is that the law is fluid and adjusts itself to meet the circumstances of a given case.

The short point that I make to my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire, apart from the rather pompous remark about the English of his new clause, is that I congratulate him on highlighting an important issue. The burden of proof is not something which we should lightly move around or dispense with without the most careful thought.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): My hon. and learned Friend is making an extremely important point. Burden of proof is even more important in relation to tribunals and arbitration because there is no appeal on those except on a point of law, whereas if it were a normal case in the courts, recourse to appeal would be readily available.

Mr. Garnier: That is another point which the House is entitled to bear in mind. I shall not develop it now, as a number of hon. Members wish to speak. I am simply highlighting the issues between the hon. Member for Wentworth and my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire. I trust that, before the Bill goes much further, a good deal more thought will be given to that question.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): I congratulate the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Healey) on bringing the Bill this far on behalf of Lord Archer of Sandwell. It is a great privilege to introduce a private Member's Bill.

I strongly urge the House to support new clause 9. I should declare an interest, as I had been in industry all my life until 1 May. I regret to inform the House that employers are disillusioned about their chances in industrial tribunals, and that leads to the nub of the new clause: there must be no dilution or weakening of the mechanism by which proof is brought to a tribunal.

We have had an interesting contest between learned lawyers on the Opposition side. I want to give the House two or three examples of real life. The current system is unsatisfactory. A company that I know well had a redundancy programme. One employee was made redundant, along with a large number of others. He had worked satisfactorily for a long time and there had never been any complaint about him. Simply, the world market had changed, demand had dropped and a substantial number of people sadly had to be made redundant.

In the course of the redundancy programme, things changed. The employee was called back in, given a personal interview by the managing director, and offered a job. The managing director kept a written diary of events every day. He wrote down that the interview had taken place, and an offer was made in writing at the same level of remuneration. Amazingly, the company was sued for unfair dismissal and, rather than go through with the tribunal, it settled out of court. That cost the company several thousand pounds. On the strength of that, several others in the programme pulled off the same trick.

Mr. Healey: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman could explain how his example relates to the burden of proof. I made it clear that, in unfair dismissal cases, the primary burden of proof is on the employee rather than the employer. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that runs contrary to the points being made by his hon. Friends?

Mr. Paterson: The point that I am trying to make is that the current system is not entirely satisfactory. The new clause tabled by me and my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) will prevent any further dilution. I shall give a couple more examples in a second. I am concerned that the burden is slipping more and more onto the employer to prove that he is not guilty, as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) has said.

An employee of a business that I know in the modular building sector stole some wire. He admitted it to the personnel director. He was dismissed on the spot, as per the rules agreed by the work force and the company. Amazingly, he went to a tribunal and, because there were no witnesses when he was interviewed by the personnel director, he won the case. A self-confessed thief received compensation of £6,000, which seems bizarre. It is most disheartening for employers.

In another company in the telecommunications industry, an employee had an appalling attendance record. It was a big, well-organised business. It was unionised. The union did not support the plaintiff's case. The man had gone through all the rigmarole of verbal and written warnings and was dismissed because he had not provided a medical certificate as per the rules laid down by the company. The medical certificate turned up seven days after he had been dismissed. He took the company to a tribunal. Great analysis was made of the stamp and the time of posting. Common sense would say that the employee had a weak case, but, again, he won. Common sense suggested that right was not on his side, but the tribunal went against the company. The matter is critical. Proof in such cases depends on all the evidence being presented. Our new clause requires that it be provided.

The other massive disadvantage to employers is that a date is fixed for a tribunal. If members of the management cannot attend, another date is arbitrarily fixed on which members of the management have to attend.

A senior salesman in the robotics industry was made redundant by a sales director, who then went to the United States on a three-month secondment. The salesman complained, the tribunal laid down a date for a hearing, and the company had to decide whether to bring the sales director back from the United States to attend the tribunal. Tribunals usually start at 10 am, and sometimes run over into the next day, so the sales director might have had to stay in the United Kingdom for two days before flying back to the United States. The case could have taken up a whole week of a senior sales director's time.

1.30 pm

The case was dropped, and settled outside the tribunal. For the company, it was not worth the bother of bringing the sales director back from abroad. Cases involving production staff are much worse, because several senior managers may have to attend a tribunal, which might take up more than a day of their time if they are not called until late afternoon on the opening day. The cost of tribunals to continuous process industries can be horrendous, because senior technicians have to be away from work. Managers, especially those in smaller companies, are worried that going to tribunal is not worth the candle. Therefore, they settle out of court, which cannot be right.

The alternative is a civil court, but such proceedings take too long. A tribunal can pay a maximum compensation of £25,000, so senior executives are forced to go to law and employ the services of people such as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough and my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh). Civil court proceedings are far too costly and take far too much time, so I am in favour of the tribunal system. I strongly support new clause 9, because it is vital to provide maximum evidence if employers are not to become disillusioned with the Tribunal Service.

Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes): When I was asked to take on this Front-Bench job for today—

Mr. Graham Allen (Lord Commissioner to the Treasury): A long overdue promotion.

Mr. Steen: That is absolutely right.

It is an honour and a privilege to have been asked to take on this Front-Bench job. The only snag is that hon. Members have ensured that I have not spoken until 1.31 pm, knowing that the debate would end by 2.30 pm. They had a different agenda: they wanted to give me the honour and privilege of sitting on the Front Bench without having the opportunity to hear me speak.

My contribution will be short, but pithy. I want Labour Members to realise that we not only support the Bill and want it to go through the House as effectively and efficiently as possible but were designing such a Bill before the unfortunate events of 1 May. It is no good their thinking that we are opposed to the Bill and are trying to talk it out. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Hon. Members will appreciate the quality of the speeches and arguments of my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier). Conservative Members are engaged in high-quality debate, which may be why so many Labour Members are absent: they may feel that the debate is of such high quality that they cannot grasp the arguments.

I am glad that the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Healey) is present. He clearly can follow the debate, although he may be struggling a little.

The relationship between employer and employee can be difficult and in a civilised society it is important to have an effective system for the hearing and satisfying of grievances. There is, however, a certain irony in our legislating for a quicker, cheaper and less formal way of removing the burden from the system of tribunals—which was itself a way of removing pressure from the courts. We hope that we shall not have to devise a system to remove pressure from voluntary arbitration. That is what the Bill is about, but new clause 9 deals with the burden of proof—an issue which strikes at the root of our legal system.

This country can proudly say that a man is presumed innocent until he is proved guilty. That is what the new clause is about: it is about ensuring that the employee is not in a privileged position as against the employer; it is about producing neutrality. I understand that, without the new clause, the employee will be privileged: it will be presumed that he is innocent and the employer is guilty. That is why members of my party are so keen for the new clause to be accepted. Although we support the Bill—and, perhaps, have been the architects of it over many years—there is growing concern, as can be heard, that this problem needs to be put right.

Mr. Leigh: I have some difficulty with my hon. Friend's argument. Traditionally, the whole point of the tribunals that we are discussing has been their informality and accessibility. I must tell my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), with respect, that the wording of his new clause could benignly be described as dense or difficult to understand, and that it could even be described as near gobbledegook. How will it further the informality and accessibility of tribunals?

Mr. Steen: It is always a joy to see my hon. Friend in the Chamber—although on this occasion I would have preferred him not to be present.

My answer to my hon. Friend is simple. If I may say so, I do not think that he entirely understands the thrust of the Bill, which, as I understand it, is to provide an informal arbitration arrangement. The industrial tribunal—which is being renamed—is just one of the methods that an employee can use in an attempt to claim his rights. Employers have rights as well, however.

The Bill provides three ways in which an employee can claim his rights. First, he can use the system that his company may have for dealing with disputes. Many large companies have their own internal processes. That way of seeking redress is very informal. The employee approaches his company, with or without the help of the union, and presents his problem. Secondly, with the agreement of his employer, the employee can ask for arbitration. The whole point of the Bill is to enable employees to take advantage of an informal arrangement simply because the industrial tribunal has become too formal. What was established as an informal procedure has become over-formal. All that my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire seeks to do is correct the burden of proof in relation to more formal proceedings. I suggest that my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), whose skill, intelligence and ingenuity are respected in all parts of the House, considers the Bill in the round and does not worry too much about the burden of proof provision in the new clause. I hope that he is satisfied with that answer.

I am concerned about the time that will be available to debate the excellent amendments and new clauses that have been skilfully and responsibly formulated by my hon. Friends. It would be discourteous to the House to say more on the new clause. We are debating a splendid Bill. We got it right and the Government have taken it on and, perhaps, made some changes. The new clause would make it even better. If the Government cannot accept the rather skilful, but perhaps not entirely clear, wording of the new clause, perhaps my hon. Friend will withdraw it on the basis of the Government's agreeing to produce better wording.

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Ian McCartney): I welcome the hon. Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) to the Dispatch Box. Over the past 11 years, his attempts to get there have ended in abysmal failure and I am pleased that on this occasion, albeit for a short time, he is able to speak from the Opposition Front Bench. I hope he gets an opportunity to do that more often so that I can engage in debates with him—as I have for many hours in Committee.

As the hon. Gentleman said, the Bill's proposals were put out for public consultation by the previous Administration, but they failed to act. That has been left to us. We have the full support of the Confederation of British Industry, the Institute of Directors and employee and employer organisations throughout the country. The previous Government put the burden of proof provision in the proposal that went to consultation and was accepted in principle.

The hon. Gentleman said that the Conservatives got the Bill right when they were in government. It is therefore nonsense to ask us to amend a clause which, under the previous Government's consultation, was accepted by both sides of industry as an acceptable way to proceed.

Hon. Members are under a misapprehension: the Bill is not a threat to employers. There is no presumption of guilt. The hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) got it right in the best and shortest summing up that I have heard in the House in 11 years: the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) was talking gobbledegook. I can put it no better than that. He and I spent some time debating the National Minimum Wage Bill and it is obvious that he is not prepared to forget the fact that, despite his attempts to encourage us to do so, we were not prepared to change the concept of the burden of proof as it relates to that Bill or to this one. It does no more and no less than identify for the purposes of the process who is best responsible for providing factual information on which decisions are based. I ask hon. Members to resist new clause 9 and to leave the Bill as it stands, because, as I have said, it has the support of both sides of industry.

Mr. Lansley: I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) was criticising the drafting of new clause 9. In that respect, I fear that I am not a lawyer and perhaps did not explain the matter well enough. However, the point, which was made in the debate, is that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) made plain, there will be a natural presumption for the burden of proof to be established in tribunals or courts on the basis of the evidence. Increasingly, and in too many cases, the burden of proof rests on one party and a presumption is required of the tribunals by way of statutory injunction rather than on the basis of the evidence that is presented by the two parties.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Healey) for the spirit in which he contributed to the debate. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 2

DETERMINATIONS WITHOUT A HEARING OR FULL HEARING

Mr. Garnier: I beg to move amendment No. 14, in page 2, leave out lines 7 to 10.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 3, in page 2, line 9, leave out

'(whether or not they have subsequently withdrawn it)'.

No. 16, in page 2, line 10, at end insert

'provided that such consent was given at a time when all relevant parties have had a fair opportunity to obtain competent independent advice'.

1.45 pm

Mr. Garnier: Amendment No. 16 adds a safety mechanism to employment tribunal proceedings, especially where the regulations, as amended, allow for disputes to be resolved or determined without any hearing.

I invite the House to consider clause 2, which refers to "section 7 of the Employment Tribunals Act 1996 (which authorises the making of employment tribunal procedure regulations)".

Clause 2 allows an insertion into that Act in these terms:

"(3A) Employment tribunal procedure regulations may authorise the determination of proceedings without any hearing (and in private) where the parties have given their written consent (whether or not they have subsequently withdrawn it)."

I fully understand the need for speed in the delivery of justice in certain circumstances. There are some cases where a good dose of adversarial justice is required to get to the nub of the dispute, whether it is a dispute of law or of fact. We see that in magistrates courts day in, day out, where motoring cases are often dealt with without a full hearing. Indeed, the Magistrates' Courts (Procedure) Bill, which has completed its Committee stage upstairs and is due for Report here, I dare say a little after Easter, is another example of where a much speedier version of events can be arrived at without any detraction from the justice required in any given motoring case.

This Bill authorises the determination of proceedings without any hearing. I have a little concern, which amendment No. 16 may alleviate, about the words "and in private" because justice, if it is to be done—I can see my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) groaning at the use of yet another cliché—must be seen to be done. The words "and in private" would cause me even more concern if my amendment were not allowed into subsection (3A).

The subsection continues:

"where the parties have given their written consent (whether or not they have subsequently withdrawn it)."

The words in parenthesis again underline the need for the amendment. It is one thing to do away with the need for a hearing; it is another to have the proceedings held in private. It is one thing to allow parties to give their written consent to the disposal of the matter without a hearing and in private, but quite another for disadvantaged, possibly not very well educated, people to have their claim decided in private, without the benefit of competent independent advice.

The House has, I hope, noticed that, although I speak as a lawyer, I do not require the words "competent and independent legal advice" or "independent legal advice" to be entered into the Bill. What is important is that the person making the claim can obtain competent independent advice.

Many of the cases that have come before industrial tribunals and will come before the new employment tribunals have and will be brought by individual employees without the assistance of a trade union. I know that the Minister is a doughty supporter of trade unions and their rights and the way they have assisted employees. There is a place for trade unions and they have played a valuable part in the history of the 20th century and the economic growth of this country. However, not everybody, for reasons good and bad, has the benefit of trade union advice and representation.

Such hearings involve both sides of the employment divide. I do not mean to be controversial by using that phrase; perhaps I should talk of both sides of the employment table. Employment in my constituency is predominantly provided by small family companies with annual turnovers well under £1 million—under £100,000 in many cases—not by one huge international company. Small family employers do not necessarily have the time, money or resources to employ a firm of solicitors, whether in Leicester, London or one of the conurbations convenient to my east Midlands constituency.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson), in his remarks on new clause 9, highlighted examples of individual employers who feel that they have been placed over a barrel by the way the system is stacked against them. I seek to protect those employers—and the employees I mentioned earlier—from being railroaded into a result with which they feel no connection. Unless people are able to give informed consent, in this as in many other areas of dispute, it will be difficult for the public to be satisfied with the legislation we have provided and the way in which the tribunal system works.

I urge the House to consider carefully the need for independent and competent advice. The genesis of the Bill stems from the work of the previous President of the Board of Trade, now Lord Lang, and the consultation process that accompanied his draft Bill in 1996. That consultation produced some interesting conclusions, and I am grateful to the Library staff for their assistance in my research.

The consultation document published in July 1996 explained that the aim of the proposal was to streamline the procedures by allowing the chairman to determine a case on the basis of written evidence and without a hearing. The consent of both parties would be required. The parties could opt for that procedure or the tribunal could of its own volition ask the parties whether they agreed that their case could be determined on written advice alone.

Some 67 responses were received in favour of the proposal and only 33 against. Importantly, 101 of those responding failed to express a view. That underscores my point that parties in proceedings need competent independent advice. If people are not prepared, when they are handed a consultation paper, to express a view about whether a dispute should be handled without a proper hearing, that highlights the need for independent advice to be available. Obviously, if advice is available but people do not take it, that is their hard luck. The Bill should ensure that advice is available to those who are invited to attend the hearing.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that—for two reasons—the Minister was being particularly unfair when he attacked the previous Administration for not turning the consultation paper into legislation? The first reason is that the consultation period was last autumn, after the Queen's Speech, so it would not have been possible to introduce legislation based on the consultation paper before the fast approaching general election. The second reason is that the new Government also have not included such legislation in a Queen's Speech. We are debating a private Member's Bill.

Mr. Garnier: I take those points, but the Minister is incapable of malice and I would not wish to cast more aspersions on him.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that legislation passed by the House should be clear and unambiguous? Does he agree that the proposed new subsection (3A)— is ambiguous, as it can be read both ways? Does he agree that amendment No. 14 should be passed because most small firms in particular come up against this type of employment legislation only once in a blue moon? Both parties should have access to properly qualified advice.

Mr. Garnier: I think that I understand my hon. Friend's point. I have tabled my amendment because the wording in brackets is not ambiguous. I want the clause to be amended to provide greater assistance to those who do not have advice but who should have it. I think that I have made that point, and making a good point several times does not improve it.

Mr. Lansley: I should like briefly to speak to amendment No. 3, which touches on the point that has just been made on clause 2. The wording in brackets—would enable the tribunal to proceed on the basis of written submissions without a hearing, even if one party subsequently concluded that that would not be in its interest. I have tabled amendment No. 3 specifically—only—to protect people in those circumstances.

I acknowledge that there is a danger that people might vexatiously withdraw consent only to prolong proceedings or to incur additional costs. Nevertheless, one can conceive of circumstances in which parties to proceedings, particularly—as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) clearly explained—parties that are at a disadvantage against a well-financed employer who has produced very good evidence. I think that all hon. Members will acknowledge that there are circumstances in which an employee, in particular, may be far better able to expand a case in person—orally, and in cross-examination—than in written proceedings.

If amendment No. 14 is not accepted, we should leave that small opportunity for people to withdraw their consent to proceeding on the basis of written evidence alone—to give them their day in court.

Mr. Healey: It was remiss of me earlier not to welcome the hon. Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) to the Opposition Front Bench. I enjoyed his distinctive speech, and welcomed his confirmation of the Conservative party's backing for the Bill.

This group of amendments deals with the power provided in clause 2 for tribunals to determine a case, when both parties agree, on the basis of written evidence alone and in private. All three amendments are unacceptable. If they were accepted, they would waste the time of both the tribunal and the parties to the tribunal.

Amendment No. 14 would not prevent determinations based on written evidence, but would merely prevent such determinations being made in private. As such determinations are made according to the papers on the file, there is no need for a public hearing. The proper principle outlined by the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) that justice must be seen to be done does not come into play in this respect. Amendment No. 14 would be a waste of the tribunal's time.

Amendment No. 3 would enable parties who had given their consent for a written determination in private to withdraw that consent at any stage in the subsequent proceedings. That would unnecessarily waste the time of the tribunal and the other party.

2 pm

Amendment No. 16 touches on a much more important point that was eloquently set out by the hon. and learned Member for Harborough. It seeks to insert a requirement for the parties to have had the opportunity to receive advice before agreeing to such a determination. Although it is important for parties to seek advice at each stage in taking a case to a tribunal, particularly when waiving a right, for instance in seeking a compromise agreement, we cannot reasonably require them to do so before deciding to have their case dealt with in a certain way. Parties are not giving up their right to have their case determined by the tribunal; they are merely choosing to have it dealt with in a particular way.

In conclusion, the amendments do nothing to achieve the aims of the Bill in streamlining the tribunal system of justice or to make it easier for employees and employers to use it.

Mr. Garnier: I was hoping that the Minister might be able to help us out of this difficulty, but he appears to be glued to the Front Bench. It seems that I am not getting the support that I had hoped to get for the amendment, despite its merits. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Healey) for explaining his view on the matter and I fully take the point that the absence of a requirement to take advice, which he clearly does not want in the Bill, does not prevent anyone from doing so. Clearly, anyone who is faced with such a problem ought to seek competent independent advice before taking any decision about his rights.

I am sorry that the House is not with me on this matter, and, as I understand the mathematics of the House of Commons, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 4

HEARINGS BY CHAIRMAN AND ONE OTHER MEMBER

Mr. Lansley: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 3, line 46, leave out from 'means' to 'consent' in line 48.

Amendment No. 2 is very straightforward and I shall not detain the House long in explaining its purpose. In circumstances where a tribunal, which normally consists of a chairman and two lay members, is reduced to two members—the chairman and one lay member—by virtue of the failure to attend on the part of one lay member, for example, the amendment would prevent the proceedings going ahead, save with the consent of both parties. That would include circumstances in which one of the parties was not present at the hearing.

Whether or not the parties to a hearing are present, they will have consented or presented evidence to a hearing with legitimate expectations about the character of that hearing. It may be, for example, that an employee is assuming that the tribunal will consist of two lay members, one of whom may have a trade union background. If that trade union person fails to attend, the legitimate expectations of the employee, whether or not he or she is present, will have been frustrated. Under those circumstances, the amendment would provide that the proceedings could not go ahead. Of course, if both parties are there and give their consent, the tribunal could proceed as intended.

Mr. Ian McCartney: Those who serve on tribunals are not there to represent employer or employee interests. The two lay members are independent and are appointed for their skills. The chairman always has a legal standing. They do not represent employers or trade unions. The tribunal is there to hear the facts and make a determination on them.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to the Minister for that. I presume that when a hearing is constituted, those attending will be aware of the background of the members appointed to the tribunal and will have legitimate expectations because of that.

Mr. McCartney: I hope that that is not the case. If people whom we appointed were acting in a partisan way, I would consider it unacceptable conduct. We do not want people to act in a partisan way. We want them act independently and make judgments on the basis of fact.

Mr. Lansley: I understand the Minister's point, but I hope that he accepts that—as we debated on the National Minimum Wage Bill in relation to a chairman sitting alone—there are legitimate expectations about the character of a tribunal and the background of its members. The legally qualified chairman should sit with two wing members who bring a range of expertise. That is how tribunals are constructed. If one of those members is not there, whatever their background, the expectations on the spread of experience available may be frustrated. If the parties are prepared to consent to that, they should be able to proceed. However, if a party is not there and there were expectations about the structure of the tribunal, it would be wrong for the tribunal to proceed.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): There is a problem. Initially, it sounds fine to say that if both parties consent, the tribunal can go ahead. However, bearing in mind the costs that may have already been incurred, there could be considerable pressure. Both parties may apparently consent to the tribunal going ahead in a truncated form, but that could be a difficult judgment, perhaps made with some misgiving, mindful of the costs that would otherwise be incurred.

Mr. Lansley: I understand my hon. Friend's point. If the parties are there, they have to balance those considerations. They may feel under pressure of costs. If they are not there—this is where the amendment would be particularly relevant—they are not in a position to weigh up the consequences of the failure of one member of the tribunal to attend. Tribunals may take a long time. Considerable resources may be at stake. The establishment of the tribunal and its balance between the legally qualified chairman and the lay members can be significant in such circumstances. I commend the amendment.

Mr. Steen: I hope that the Labour party is not programmed to reject all the amendments and new clauses tabled by the Conservatives. My hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) has made a serious point. I hope that it can be squeezed in without too much fuss. I hope that it will be seriously considered and not just rejected out of hand.

Mr. Healey: The purpose of clause 4 is to deal with a particular circumstance that may arise from time to time. Tribunal proceedings may currently be heard in the absence of one lay member—for example, if they are ill—but only if all the parties agree. All those parties must agree, regardless of whether they are present.

If a tribunal is scheduled to proceed and one of the parties has said that they do not wish to be present, they must still be consulted on whether they are content for the proceedings to go ahead if one of the lay members is unable to attend because they are ill or have had a crash on the way. It is not always possible to contact the absent party in such circumstances. As a result, hearings have to be postponed, rescheduled and listed for another day. The amendment would negate the entire change proposed in clause 4. Indeed, it would have been clearer if the amendment had said, "Delete clause 4", because that is its effect.

Clause 4 was a response to a request by tribunal chairmen in England, Wales and Scotland during the 1994 round of consultation. It was then overwhelmingly supported by respondents to consultation on the draft Bill. Clause 4 will lead to a swifter resolution in a few cases, and to that extent it is worth having. I urge Conservative Members to withdraw amendment No. 2.

Mr. Lansley: I have neither support from the Government Front Bench nor from the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Healey), the Bill's promoter. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 5

Legal Offices

Mr. Leigh: I beg to move amendment No. 18, in page 4, line 19, at end insert—

Mr. Leigh: I have been asked to speak to this group of amendments. They are very clear and I hope that the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Healey) will think that they are useful additions to the Bill. All that they seek to do is ensure that the legal officer is someone of appropriate standing and experience—because his duties will be very onerous.

The Bill specifies that a legal officer can be appointed to relieve chairmen of some of their duties. The introduction of the concept of a legal officer has long been envisaged by those who wanted to promote the Bill—indeed, by the previous Government, whose consultation paper in July 1996 said:

"The aim of the proposals is to relieve tribunal chairmen, particularly in the large offices, of some of the interlocutory duties they currently are required to fulfil by appointing 'legal officers'."

The duties that will have to be undertaken by the legal officer are very wide ranging. They could include granting postponements, making witness orders and carrying out pre-hearing reviews. As a practising barrister, I can say that such pre-hearing reviews are becoming increasingly important. It will therefore be immediately apparent to the House that the duties of legal officers will be very heavy.

Mr. Garnier: Is it of help to my hon. Friend to put to him the similarity of the work that it is proposed will be done by legal officers with that already done by district judges and Queen's Bench and Chancery Division masters in litigation with which he and I will be very familiar?

Mr. Leigh: My hon. and learned Friend makes a very interesting point. Only this year, I was engaged not in civil proceedings but in criminal proceedings, where pre-trial reviews were very onerous and difficult as they appertained to a long fraud trial. Such matters really have to be considered by a very experienced judge. That shows some of the problems. Although the proposals concern interlocutory proceedings, pre-hearing reviews could deal with quite complex matters. Therefore, the duties that we are placing on a legal officer are very important.

Notwithstanding that, consultation took place. Of the respondents, 49 were in favour of appointing legal officers, 19 were against and 133 expressed no view. Like my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier), who was at the time referring to a previous group of amendments, I am rather worried that 133 expressed no view. One assumes that those who take an interest in these matters have come down in favour of the appointment of legal officers.

The trouble is: are we absolutely convinced that legal officers will have the necessary experience? Will they be of appropriate standing? Addressing such questions is the purpose of the amendments.

2.15 pm

Mr. Nicholls: If I have understood the purpose correctly, the legal officer will not simply be appointed by qualification, because of the point about time spent. Also incorporated is the possibility of authorised advocates and authorised litigators, which is perhaps a concept with which many people outside the House will not be immediately familiar.

Mr. Leigh: I am very glad that my hon. Friend has made that point. That is why the amendments are so appropriate. Amendment No. 18 says that a legal officer in England and Wales should be "a barrister of not less than two years call (whether in practice as such or employed to give legal advice)", or

"a solicitor admitted for not less than two years who holds a practising certificate".

It seems to me that this is an entirely proper amendment.

If a barrister has two years' call, we might assume that he has the necessary experience to undertake this sort of work. The House may not be familiar with the way in which barristers are trained. One can become a barrister before having any practical experience of court work, providing written advice or anything else. Indeed, there are some barristers in the House—distinguished Members of Parliament—who have never pleaded in the courts and have no direct practical experience of legal work. Therefore, if we are to appoint legal officers to carry out these onerous duties, it is entirely sensible to stipulate that they have the basic experience of two years' call.

I hope that the hon. Member for Wentworth, when he stops walking around the Chamber seeking advice, will accept what I have said. I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Ian McCartney: The amendment raises an important point and I want to respond in a positive way. It is right that the legal officers are fully able to carry out the important responsibilities that will be assigned to them. My officials are considering this carefully and will consult those with an interest, most important, the presidents of the industrial tribunals. We gave an undertaking in the other place to do that, and I reaffirm that now.

The concept of legal officers is new, so it is important that it is tested to see whether it is feasible. In order to do that, a pilot scheme is being prepared. It would entirely defeat the object of that scheme if matters such as qualifications, tasks, and so on were set out in primary legislation at this stage. It is also unnecessary, because matters relating to tribunals are set out in the regulations dealing with their constitution. Legal officers will not be able to carry out pre-hearing reviews or determine proceedings, except where a case has been withdrawn or settled.

I hope that I have reassured the House that we intend to deal with these matters in a competent, effective way—through consultation, by piloting and, having learnt from the piloting, by bringing in appropriate schemes. By "appropriate", I mean subject to consultation. The whole purpose of the Bill is to ensure that the partners in the case consent to the process. It is important to handle the matter carefully.

As there was a good deal of support for the principle of the Bill during consultation, and as it is our intention to move forward in a careful and measured way, I hope that the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) will withdraw the amendment. His points were genuine and effective, but we have already considered them and our proposals should therefore satisfy him.

Mr. Lansley: I understand that there are some lawyers with employment expertise who, because they do not require rights of audience in court, are not authorised advocates or litigators. Is it intended to include that sort of employment law specialist?

Mr. McCartney: Given the time, I will write to the hon. Gentleman fully setting out our intentions.

Mr. Leigh: I am grateful for what the Minister has said. He responded helpfully and positively to the amendments and the purport of them. I am delighted that he intends to undertake further consultation and that it is not envisaged that the legal officers to whom I referred will carry out pre-hearing reviews. In those circumstances, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mr. Healey.]

2.19 pm

Mr. Lansley: I will not take up a great deal of time, but, having moved a new clause and tabled a number of amendments for Report stage, I want to take the opportunity to extend a general welcome to the principle of the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen), who spoke eloquently to the new clause—rather more eloquently than I did earlier—gave the Bill a general welcome from Conservative Members.

The Bill was very much the product of lengthy consultation and it would be remiss of the Minister to chide the previous Government for failing to bring in the Bill. We proceeded with the Bill through means of exhaustive consultation—rightly so, given that it relates to the administration of justice and, therefore, has to command the utmost confidence of the parties involved.

There is also a slight sense that we wish that we had not arrived at this point. Tribunals were initially established to offer a speedy, effective and cheaper route of justice than that provided by the courts. Yet we have alternative disputes resolutions and mechanisms because parties to the dispute can perceive the tribunals procedure as being relatively expensive.

Notwithstanding the fact that delays in tribunals are less now than when the Bill was conceived, a considerable volume of business passes through them.

Mr. Steen: I hope that my hon. Friend will comment on another point. The Government are creating increasing amounts of legislation that will result in industrial tribunals being even more blocked. Also, there is more legislation coming from Europe, which will create another blockage. Does my hon. Friend agree that, for those reasons, the Bill is necessary?

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend knows well that the Bill was contemplated by the previous Government as a way of dealing with the considerable and growing volume of business passing through industrial tribunals at that time. It was not contemplated to deal with the additional cases that will be brought before employment tribunals as a result of the national minimum wage legislation. However, it would not be wrong to expect that that legislation will bring additional business before the tribunals, so everything that can be done to ease progress should be done.

My hon. Friend rightly said that the Bill should also try to buttress internal appeals procedures wherever possible within companies. Some amendments have been tabled on that subject, but time has not permitted us to debate them in detail. Parties should seek, wherever possible, to deal with their disputes through internal company procedures. Where that is not possible, it must be in the interests of the companies and the participants to deal with disputes through compromise agreements. We have a useful measure that allows more compromise agreements to be entered into, using not just legal advice, but wider advice and arbitration procedures.

The Government have largely followed the path set down in previous consultation and in the document published in July 1996 by Lord Lang, the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. One omission is that the Government have chosen not to use private arbitration schemes in addition to those arranged through ACAS, which is a pity. I acknowledge that, if they wish, the parties to a dispute can go to arbitration. However, the parties entering into private arbitration cannot, as I understand it—I stand to be corrected by the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Healey) and the Minister, who understand such matters better than I do—do so in ways that take advantage of powers contained in the legislation. One such power involves setting aside an appeal against that arbitration. The legislation circumscribes the circumstances in which parties are likely to use arbitration. I think that both parties will probably find it risky to use arbitration, except through the procedures devised by ACAS. That is not to say that ACAS itself is the arbitrator or that ACAS will not necessarily be using some of those people who are best qualified to undertake such arbitrations. They may not necessarily be legally qualified, but they could come from a range of people with appropriate experience—from the workplace, trade unions, personnel, management or wherever. None the less, they will do so in the context of a scheme established by ACAS rather than one that is established by bodies other than ACAS. It is in the nature of the private route for resolution procedures that bodies other than ACAS may be able to devise cheaper, less bureaucratic, more accessible and altogether more user-friendly routes to arbitration.

It would have been within the spirit of the way in which the measure has been brought about—essentially on an all-party basis—if the Government had proceeded on the basis of the consultation that took place before the election, rather than resting on the bureaucratic body that they know best. That is not to decry or diminish the role of ACAS, which I accept has an established role in collective disputes, though less so in individual disputes. It may well be that, by using pilot procedures and permissive legislation, it would have been possible for private schemes to be established, which would have worked effectively and might have built up rising confidence on the part of the parties that, unfortunately, enter into disputes.

Notwithstanding that criticism, I take the opportunity on Third Reading to welcome the Bill and to offer congratulations to the hon. Member for Wentworth on steering it through the House. He has done so with a wealth of expertise and experience, which is practical, pragmatic and, it is to be hoped, proved in the event.

2.26 pm

Mr. Gray: I add my voice to those of my right hon. and hon. Friends in offering congratulations to the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Healey) on having the sound good sense to introduce the Bill and pilot it through its various stages in the House. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman also on having the sound good sense to take up a proposal that was first thought up by the Conservative Administration, which ended on 1 May 1997. It was the brainchild of the then President of the Board of Trade, Ian Lang. I am sure that he deeply regrets that, because the consultation procedure took place in the autumn of last year, he was not able to introduce a Bill to enact the proposals on which he had consulted.

It was slightly ungracious of the Minister to upbraid the Conservative party for not having introduced the proposals set out in the Bill into law; the Labour party has equally failed to do so. There has been a Queen's speech following the election of the Labour party into government, yet it failed to include the proposals in that programme. As I have said, I congratulate the hon. Member for Wentworth. I hope that he will be successful in introducing the Bill.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): My hon. Friend will know that the previous President of the Board of Trade produced a general consultation paper and a draft Bill. Does he agree that it is a great tribute to Ian Lang that he introduced a draft Bill, because it gave an opportunity for everybody involved to consider the rights and wrongs of the proposals and to get future legislation right? The Bill is slightly different from the draft Bill. That draft Bill gives the lie to the Government's suggestion that, by introducing draft Bills, they are developing a new policy. We have already seen draft Bills.

Mr. Gray: My hon. Friend makes a good point. The Conservative party conceived the notion of introducing draft Bills. It is slightly irritating or upsetting to hear the new Government crowing about how clever and democratic they are being in introducing such Bills. I welcome the fact that the previous President of the Board of Trade introduced a draft Bill.

The Opposition broadly support the main thrust of the Bill. However, the hon. Member for Wentworth and the Minister will have heard valid and important concerns expressed by us during our debates. We naturally massively support the notion of industrial tribunals. I understand that there have been 1 million hearings and 30,000 cases so far. They have been a significant and accessible route for settling industrial disputes.

We are wholly supportive of industrial tribunals and the main thrust of the Bill. We are concerned that they became clogged up towards the end of the previous Parliament because of the volume of cases that were brought before them. Therefore, any means that can be found to make them more efficient; that allow more cases to be heard; and allow the rights and worries of employees and employers to be heard is important. I am glad that my right hon. and hon. Friends support the main thrust of the Bill.

There are two or three areas of particular concern, which we have raised during the debate. They concern—

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed on Friday 27 March.

Hospitals (East Kent)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dowd.]

2.34 pm

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): I am most grateful for the opportunity to hold this Adjournment debate on the future of the Kent and Canterbury and the Whitstable and Tankerton hospitals. I am grateful to the Minister for Public Health, who has had to come, at the end of a long, hard week, to an empty Chamber to reply to the debate.

As I speak, my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid–Kent (Mr. Rowe) is on his way to the Kent and Canterbury hospital to hear its plans for reconfiguring the services in east Kent. I am grateful for the expression of concern from my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) and to the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Prosser), who was visiting Buckland hospital in his constituency this morning. He has sent me a courteous note in which he expresses concern about the future of the Kent and Canterbury.

There is extreme concern. Since the middle of December, I have received well over 2,000 letters from constituents. There were no standard letters; they were each individually written. Many of them gave testimony of lives saved and conditions healed at these two splendid hospitals. I have also received literally hundreds of letters that I have had to redirect to neighbouring Members of Parliament.

Although it would be out of order for me to make any reference to the Public Gallery, the fact that many hundreds of people from many different communities in east Kent and all political parties have taken the trouble to come up to London today is a sign of the level of support for these two fine hospitals.

The new document produced by the Kent and Canterbury hospital, entitled "Tomorrow's Health Care for East Kent: A New Direction", offers hope in what was an extremely dark situation. Before I outline my reasons for supporting this exciting new proposal, I want to touch briefly on the four principal reasons why the Kent and Canterbury is critical for health care in east Kent as a whole. I do not intend to make, and I never have made, any narrow constituency points about employment or other local issues. I argue solely that the hospital is vital to acute health care in east Kent as a whole. I shall make some brief remarks later about the Whitstable and Tankerton hospital, which is also extremely important on the community side.

The first of my four reasons is the critical importance of east Kent's five regional specialties—cancer, renal, neonatal intensive care, haemophilia and neurophysiology. All five are based at the Kent and Canterbury, and their move would involve breaking up recognised centres of excellence. For example, the cancer unit is one of only three in the country to have received a recent chartermark for excellence.

East Kent health authority has admitted that breaking up the teams involves a considerable risk, but their move from the current site near the middle of east Kent would in all five cases reduce accessibility. In the cases of the cancer and neonatal units, the service would move right out of east Kent. Radiotherapy patients would have to travel all the way to Maidstone for daily treatment.

The second reason is a wider loss of access to a broad range of acute medical services. For many of the people with cars who live in the Canterbury city council area, which on its own has a far larger population than Thanet and extends well beyond my constituency, for the people who live in Faversham and for the tens of thousands of people who live in villages in east Kent, Canterbury, as the hub of the public transport system, is the only accessible acute hospital in east Kent.

It is ironic that some of the strongest representations about the closure of the Kent and Canterbury have come from communities in the Thanet, North and Thanet, South constituencies, such as Herne Bay, Sandwich and Wingham, where some of the best-attended meetings opposing closure have been held. Margate is inaccessible even to the people there, especially those who rely on public transport.

The third argument concerns quality. There is an increasingly tight national and international market in key medical skills. The Kent and Canterbury has every consultant post filled and every junior doctor post accredited for training. Its consultants include several of national distinction. The view of general practitioners is the best measure of quality, and their overwhelming support for the Kent and Canterbury hospital is reflected across many communities by the fact that those representing 240,000 people have given their backing to that hospital.

The fourth reason why the Kent and Canterbury is critical to health care is co-operation. Sadly, Margate hospital faces a recruiting crisis: six consultant posts are unfilled despite the fact that 19 Kent and Canterbury consultants regularly help out there. The recent reorganisation of paediatric services in east Kent has shown that the necessary critical mass for doctor training can be provided if departments in our three acute hospitals operate on three sites, but as one unit. However, if the Kent and Canterbury is removed from the picture, the extreme distance between sites—40 miles along one of the most congested roads in the United Kingdom—would mean that Ashford, on its own, would be unable to support Thanet.

The Kent and Canterbury proposal is positive. I am delighted that it has the backing not only of medical, nursing and support staff at the Kent and Canterbury hospital, but of a huge number of local GPs and a growing number of consultants and other staff at Ashford. The essence of the document's proposal is that all three sites should continue to operate, but on a unified basis under one management structure.

The proposal emphasises that retention of the five core services—acute medicine, acute surgery, accident and emergency services, and maternity and paediatric provision—on all three sites is pivotal. At the same time, financial savings could be made in three key areas: first, through cutting management overheads by amalgamating the three trusts—a cynic would suggest that it is obvious why doctors at Ashford, who realise that the proposal is the right way ahead, and their management, who strongly oppose it, are divided; secondly, by cutting clinical costs by significantly increasing efficiency on individual sites—especially, as the EKHA has noted, at Ashford and at Thanet; and thirdly, by cutting support costs through rationalising certain supporting services, which do not directly interface with patients, on to individual sites at the hospitals.

Two of the most exciting Kent and Canterbury proposals—improvements in education and training, and improvements in research and development—would take advantage of the Kent and Canterbury's proximity to the university. That would add critical mass by allowing continuing activity on all three sites, but under a common, tri-site umbrella.

The package would provide east Kent with a hospital configuration that would attract top-quality staff, continue to offer maximum accessibility to patients, and protect key regional specialties, and would achieve savings on individual overheads and retain the necessary critical mass for doctor training.

This model may help to pave the way for future debates in areas throughout the country where tension is developing between patient accessibility and the continuing demand for more centralisation to deal with doctors' training. I note that three hospitals in Surrey and Sussex are moving towards a similar model. I welcome the re-establishment by the EKHA of a steering committee to examine the proposal in detail. I am particularly pleased about the appointment of Dr. Sue Atkinson as chairman of the clinical co-ordinating group, which will include general practitioners as well as a much wider range of consultants than were involved in the original document. Obviously, much detailed work remains to be done.

Whitstable and Tankerton hospital, which really deserves a debate of its own, was built after the first world war as a memorial to the dead of the area, to care for the living. That excellent community hospital is in an unfortunate position. In December, the EKHA arbitrarily said that it was thinking of closing the hospital. Although that proposal has been removed from the consultation document—rightly, in my view—concern inevitably remains among the staff. The hospital is very popular. It is in the centre of a town that contains many elderly people, a number of whom have no access to public transport. Huge sums have been raised by the league of friends, which means that much of the hospital's building is new.

Let me draw a rather unhappy analogy. In the context of mental health, care in the community has in many ways proved a disaster. The Government are now rightly returning to a residential arrangement—an arrangement which, in many instances, is more expensive than the original provision of beds in the old hospitals. Any proposal to replace community hospitals such as Whitstable and Tankerton with alleged extra provision—care in the community—would, to say the least, have an unhappy provenance. In my view, it would lead to disaster in Whitstable.

There are two drives behind the proposal for Kent and Canterbury, and the possible proposal for Whitstable and Tankerton. There is the need for critical masses in the training of doctors—the need to recruit and train doctors of the best quality—and there is the inevitable shortage of resources. Kent and Canterbury hospital has come up with a proposal that deals with both problems.

The EKHA's original options both involve radical change. One proposal is to close Kent and Canterbury hospital, or run it right down; the other is to do the same in Thanet. Even in principle, those moves would secure only small financial savings, and in practice they would lead to huge costs—hidden costs that are just starting to emerge, as always happens with radical change. The Kent and Canterbury document, "Tomorrow's Health Care for East Kent", offers the hope of a new direction.

2.47 pm

The Minister for Public Health (Ms Tessa Jowell): I congratulate the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) on securing the opportunity to debate a matter of such evident importance to his constituents. He referred to other hon. Members who have represented their constituents' interests in a matter that is obviously important to east Kent. I am grateful to him for doing so, but I want to add the name of my hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman) who, as the hon. Gentleman may know, took part today in the farewell to Ramsgate hospital.

This is the second occasion in a matter of weeks that we have had an opportunity to debate the review of hospital services in east Kent. That is a testament to the amount of local interest in the review and, more fundamentally, to the commitment of the people of east Kent to securing a high-quality national service for themselves and their families. It is proof that the national health service is as relevant to the lives of people in east Kent and, indeed, the rest of the country as it was when it was established 50 years ago.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about some developments that have taken place during the short time since the House previously debated this matter. Before I touch on them I should like to reiterate some of the key points that were made by my hon. Friend the Minister of State in the previous debate. They provide the context in which hon. Members who represent east Kent will consider the review of hospital services and take account of their constituents' views.

I remind the House that the health authority's proposed reorganisation in east Kent is not financially driven. The Government have already provided extra money for health and social services. In east Kent, we have provided £1.66 million to help alleviate winter pressures that, in the past, have caused suffering and difficulty in local hospitals. We are anxious to relieve those pressures. We have also announced an increase of £5.3 million in real terms for next year.

Even with extra investment, change is needed in east Kent and the review is about the ability to deliver safe and effective care to patients in the district. As the hon. Member for Canterbury said, the relevant factors include the supply of doctors and their training needs and working practices. They are of the essence in delivering high-quality health care. Clinical quality requires a minimum work load, which is important in building up experience. In an acute hospital without a minimum work load, doctors cannot be properly trained, and senior doctors cannot maintain the expertise to ensure the best treatment and care for patients. Money alone cannot resolve those issues.

Since the previous debate on this subject, NHS chief executives and leading doctors have written to all NHS staff in east Kent confirming their acceptance of the need for change. That change is necessary to meet the pressures that face the NHS locally, and it reflects the broader and continuing need for national change. We applaud their efforts to explain to staff and local people the underlying rationale for change. Those people are undoubtedly anxious about what the future holds for services in the district. We do not for a moment underestimate the anxiety and concern about the prospect of any change for whatever reason.

The second important point about the consultation is that it is an attempt to establish the best way forward in the long term for services in East Kent. The consultation is genuine. I assure the House that no decisions have been taken or can or will be taken until the consultation period ends on 8 May. The debate provides an important opportunity for Ministers to be made aware of the developing concerns and views of hon. Members from east Kent.

At the end of the consultation period it will be the duty of the health authority to take account of the comments that it has received and, in the light of them, to weigh different options. Local accountability is especially important, because the way in which services are run and developed must be in tune with local needs and views, and inspire the confidence of the people who use them. That is why we hope the consultation can proceed in a spirit of consensus and with the objective of delivering a broad consensus about the right way forward. That would be in the spirit of our recently published White Paper about the NHS's future.

Should the final option chosen by the health authority be contested by either of east Kent's community health councils, the final decision will rest with Ministers. If that should happen, Ministers' responses will be fully informed by the health authority's detailed consultation and will be based on a balanced assessment of the proposals, which should themselves reflect the NHS White Paper that made clear that services should be based on integrated care and on partnership between NHS bodies and local agencies, all intended and designed to deliver a better service to patients through improved quality and efficiency.

It is important to offer, and to have the capacity to offer, prompt, high-quality treatment and care that is built around individuals' needs. It is important, too, that the new arrangements provide prompt access to specialist services that are linked to local surgeries, but we must preserve the integrity of consultation. That imposes a real discipline on Ministers.

At this stage, the discipline must be to listen rather than to comment on any of the proposals that are the subject of consultation, but I assure the House—I hope that hon. Members will make this absolutely clear to their constituents—that no decisions have been taken by Ministers, no minds have been made up and no commitments have been given. However, the need for change is, as I have said, recognised by all parts of the NHS. Of course, when consultation comes to an end in the next few months, it will be the time for discussion and debate to stop, for decisions to be made and for the East Kent authority to work together to implement the decisions, putting the uncertainty of the review behind it.

The hon. Member for Canterbury referred to the role of Whitstable and Tankerton hospital. I should like to make it clear that the services provided by community hospitals form a vital part of the comprehensive network of NHS care but that their future does not form part of this current consultation.

As the consultation document makes clear, the future of individual community hospitals will be the subject of separate detailed discussions with local general practitioners and local communities. Those discussions will also help future primary care groups to focus their attention on the role that community hospitals play in improving the health of their local populations.

I understand that the health authority has established an elderly strategic planning group with representatives from primary and secondary care sectors and social services that will help to mastermind strategic development of community services. We welcome that. I understand that the community trust has also established local groups to review in detail the operational implications on local services in Faversham, Whitstable and Tankerton.

East Kent health authority has also emphasised that the aim of any change is to provide the best quality care in the right surroundings, that patients will not be transferred inappropriately to nursing homes and that beds will not be closed until new services are available and are shown to be working effectively, which is extremely important in underpinning the contract of trust between local health services and the local community.

If proposals emerge that constitute a substantial change to service provision, of course that would require public consultation. The health authority has given, and we expect it to meet, that commitment.

The hon. Member for Canterbury also referred to concerns about care in the community and mental health. We agree that the shift from institutional care to care in the community has failed to deliver the necessary levels of support in a number of areas. That is a cause for concern. Public confidence in the policy and its implementation by the previous Administration is low, but we can have no return to the grim Victorian asylums that never were community hospitals.

Mr. Brazier: At this very moment, admissions to the Kent and Canterbury hospital are having to be restricted, and the Whitstable and Tankerton hospital is full. I am relieved to hear the Minister say that, before we let go of any beds, acute or community, the Government will make certain that we have enough beds.

Ms Jowell: That assurance is an important part of building public confidence in change. People become ill and need care day by day and it is important that treatment is available, regardless of the point reached in the cycle of change.

I come now to the major issue raised by the hon. Member for Canterbury—the proposals set out in "Tomorrow's Health Care" by the steering group. The steering group's purpose was to ensure that a joint mechanism existed to assess alternative proposals to the authority's preferred option. Things have moved on. Doctors from Kent and Canterbury have developed an alternative option, set out in a companion document—and it should be seen as such—called "Tomorrow's Health Care for Kent: A New Direction". Their proposal is to retain in-patient services at Margate, Ashford and Canterbury. I commend the doctors at Kent and Canterbury for the spirit in which they have put forward their option. Papers recently presented to the "Tomorrow's Health Care" steering group committed it to further exploration of the option. That exercise will be conducted thoroughly.

I understand that a co-ordinating group of leading doctors from all the trusts in East Kent, under the chairmanship of the regional director of public health, will ask doctors—both specialists and general practitioners—from across East Kent to consider this proposal in the light of the other proposals on which consultation is taking place. The intention is that the "Tomorrow's Health Care" steering group will consider the results of that work in about six weeks.

It would be wrong to speculate about the future. However, it is important that hon. Members have the opportunity to debate those important proposals and their consequences for their constituents. Representing the interests and concerns of their constituents is one of the most important tasks that face hon. Members, and the hon. Member for Canterbury has responded actively to the proposed reorganisation of health care for his constituents. Whatever happens in the House, the important debate will take place locally.

I am confident that every opportunity has been extended to local people to take part in local meetings and lobby Members of Parliament to ensure that, when the decisions are taken, nobody is in any doubt about the strength and balance of local feeling. We will ensure that the NHS executive continues to work closely with the NHS in east Kent to protect the interests of patients, to put them first and to build together, based on a true understanding of the issues that face the NHS locally.

We are determined to ensure that the result of the consultation is high-quality treatment offering high-quality care to the people in the district so that they have a health service fit for the 21st century. I know that local trusts and the health authority share that commitment. I assure the hon. Member for Canterbury that Ministers will do everything they can to ensure that interested parties work constructively together to find the best way forward that inspires local confidence.

The motion having been made after half-past Two o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at four minutes past Three o'clock.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

BSE

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the progress of the BSE Inquiry. [33694]

Dr. John Cunningham: The BSE Inquiry, chaired by Lord Justice Phillips, started its public hearings today. After having considered the volume of material to be assessed and the complexity of the issues under review, the Inquiry has requested an additional six months in which to complete its work. The Government have agreed, and set a revised date for delivery of the Inquiry's report of 30 June 1999.

Pigs

Ms Shipley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he plans to take to ensure farmers provide indoor-housed pigs with at least the space allowances recommended by the European Commission's Scientific Veterinary Committee in its 1997 report on the welfare of intensively kept pigs; and if he will make a statement. [32626]

Mr. Morley: The EU Scientific Veterinary Committee report is the first stage of the review of Directive 91/630 on the welfare of pigs. We are now awaiting the Commission's proposals, based on the Committee's advice, on how the Directive should be revised. The Committee's recommendations on space allowances, and any Commission proposals, will need careful study and discussion with other Member States, before decisions are taken. We remain committed to working with the industry to improve the welfare of pigs.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Marine Pollution

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to limit damage to the marine environment from hormone-disrupting chemicals. [31924]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 2 March 1998]: The scientific evidence surrounding effects linked to hormone disruption and the possible role of exposure to man-made chemicals in the environment is far from certain. We and other Government Departments are putting in place a coordinated research programme to address the uncertainties which will also address the marine environment.

At present the best example of chemical mediated hormone disruption is the masculinisation of female molluscs resulting in their inability to reproduce caused by exposure to tributyl tin (TBT). The Government have banned the use of TBT in fish farms and on vessels under 25 metres in length. Further international controls of use on larger vessels are being developed through the framework of the International Maritime Organisation. The need for controls on other chemicals currently suspected of hormone disruption will be pursued should research demonstrate that these are justified.

The Oslo and Paris Commissions have been developing an Objective and Strategy on Hazardous Substances which will identify priority hazardous substances in the marine environment for subsequent risk reduction programmes and measures. The UK is actively supporting the prioritisation of hormone disrupting chemicals in this exercise.

Empty Properties

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on trends in the number of empty (a) local authority homes, (b) private homes, (c) Government properties containing residential accommodation and (d) flats above shops in each of the last 12 years. [32319]

Mr. Raynsford [holding answer 3 March 1998]: Estimates of the numbers of vacant dwellings in England on 1 April are given in the table. No data are collected centrally on vacant flats over shops.

We will continue to encourage local housing authorities to develop effective empty property strategies to help make the best use of existing housing stock across all tenures.

Code of Practice (Conservation)

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will list the water companies that have not produced an annual report on the Code of Practice on Conservation, Access and Recreation; and what plans he has to ensure that all water companies produce such reports; [32846]

(2) what plans he has to consult non-governmental organisations on the review of the Code of Practice on Conservation, Access and Recreation; and when he plans to publish the revised code. [32847]

Angela Eagle: The following water companies have not yet submitted their Conservation, Access and Recreation reports for 1996–97:

Bournemouth and West Hampshire Water Plc
Cholderton and District Water Company
Essex and Suffolk Water Plc
Mid Southern Water Plc
Portsmouth Water Plc
South Staffordshire Water Plc
Yorkshire Water Plc

We are pursuing reports from those companies.

We propose to consult all interested bodies, including non-governmental organisations, on a draft revision of the Code of Practice, with a view to publishing a revised Code later in the year.

Core Regeneration Programme

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the total amount spent on core regeneration programme funding in each of the last five years and planned spending in the next three financial years. [32845]

Angela Eagle: The table details the amount spent on regeneration programmes in the period 1992–93 to 1996–97, forecast spend in 1997–98 and planned spend in 1998–99. Figures for 1999–2000 and 2000–01 will be agreed at the conclusion of the Comprehensive Spending Review.

A419/A417

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what performance indicators were included in the DBFO contract in relation to the new A419/A417 road scheme regarding the quality of the concrete road surface; at what stages and to what extent these performance indicators were monitored during the laying of the concrete; and if all the performance indicators were successfully achieved by the contractor before final payment was made; [32970]

(2) what was the precise specification of the DBFO contract in relation to the new A419/A417 road scheme regarding the smoothness of the concrete surface of the road; how this was specified in relation to the noise generated; and if the surface which has been provided meets that specification; [32969]

(3) how many representations his Department and Highways Agency have received regarding noise generated by the new A419/A417 road scheme; and what further noise abatement measures are proposed; [32968]

(4) what was his Department's advice regarding road surfaces and noise to the Public Inquiry Inspector on the new A419/A417 road scheme; and in what respects that advice differed from the departmental standard for a normal public procurement process for a new road. [32971]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I have asked the Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Lawrie Haynes, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown, dated 9 March 1998:

The Transport Minister, Glenda Jackson, has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Questions about the new A419/A417 road scheme.

Over 70 representations have been received about noise from the new road. The DBFO Company have agreed to extend the mounding at the Basin overbridge, with the agreement of a local landowner, and we have agreed to upgrade 200 metres of anti-dazzle fencing at Latton to a 2 metre high noise fence.

The road surface specification of the DBFO contract is listed in the Construction Requirements as "Specification for Highways Works" (SHW) published by HMSO in August 1993. This is the specification normally used for Trunk Roads in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. The specific clauses in relation to this scheme about the smoothness of the concrete surface of the road as 1026, 1029 and 1031. Copies of which have already been placed in the House of Commons Library.

The Specification does not relate smoothness of concrete finish to the noise generated.

The Construction Certificates issued by the DBFO Co, and signed by the Contractor and Designer, certify that the pavement satisfies the Construction Requirements.

The performance indicators included in the DBFO Contract regarding the quality of the concrete road surface are included in the Specification and include the clauses mentioned earlier.

The monitoring of these performance indicators is specified in Appendix 1/5 of the Specification. The Construction Certificates issued by the DBFO Co, and signed by the Contractor and Designer, certify that the pavement provided has been tested in all respects so as to satisfy the Construction Requirements.

The advice given to the Inspector, and to the general public, at the respective Public Inquiries was that the future contractor would be able to choose the road surfacing material from the alternatives allowed within the Specification for Highway Works.

The choice is the same as usually allowed under normal procurement procedures.

Train Drivers

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many train drivers are currently diagnosed as suffering from post-traumatic stress syndrome. [32843]

Ms Glenda Jackson: There is no requirement for this to be reported to the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) under current reporting requirements.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what measures are in place to rehabilitate train drivers who suffer psychological damage as a result of being involved in fatalities on railways. [32844]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Health and Safety Executive (HSE) does not keep records of what measures are in place to rehabilitate train drivers who suffer psychological damage as a result of being involved in fatalities on the railway. However, it is known that some train operating companies offer the services of professional counsellors and medical support to those drivers following involvement in a fatality on the railway.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many train drivers are currently suspended from duty as a consequence of the Driver at Risk Register. [32842]

Ms Glenda Jackson: This is a matter for the individual train operating companies and no central records are kept. Drivers placed on these Registers are not suspended from duty. They may either be put on alternative work or drive trains under specific restrictions in order to ensure both their safety and that of the travelling public.

Boundary Hedges

Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will publish regulations regarding the maximum height for boundary fences, walls or hedges between gardens; [33147]

(2) if he will ensure that leylandii hedging is restricted to six feet in height when used to separate small gardens. [33148]

Angela Eagle: There are no current regulations to control the height of leylandii or other hedges between gardens. However, under the Town and Country Planning (General Permitted Development) Order 1995, a planning application is required to erect a boundary fence or wall over one metre high next to a highway used by vehicles or over two metres elsewhere.

I am still considering whether any form of Government intervention is necessary to help resolve the problems people encounter with high hedges.

Environment Agency (Register of Masons)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will ensure that the Register of Masons being compiled by the Environment Agency is made available for public scrutiny. [33023]

Angela Eagle [holding answer 6 March 1998]: The Environment Agency has asked members of its Board, chairmen of its statutory committees and all its staff to inform the Agency is they are members of the Freemasons or other secret societies. Declarations by Board members and statutory committee chairmen will be entered on the register of their interests, which is open to public inspection. Declarations by staff will inform the Agency's Board and senior management, and will be taken into account by them where appropriate. The Agency does not intend to make staff declarations public. It will make information publicly available in April 1998 on the number of staff, Board members and statutory committee chairmen who have declared that they are Freemasons.

Green Belt

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the guidance in PPG2 (Revised) in respect of the circumstances in which the development of land entirely enclosed by buildings can be regarded as inappropriate in the context of its impact on the Green Belt. [33263]

Mr. Raynsford: [holding answer 6 March 1998]: Planning Policy Guidance note 2 sets out the types of development which are not inappropriate in Green Belts. There remains a general presumption against inappropriate development which is harmful to the purpose of the Green Belt. The fact that land is entirely surrounded by buildings does not mean that development on that land is appropriate, or that it will have no impact on the Green Belt. Application of the guidance in PPG2 is a matter for local planning authorities taking account of the individual circumstances of each case.

Vehicle Licence Duty

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the total income to the Treasury from vehicle licence duty in each of the last three years. [33346]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Total Income to the Treasury from vehicle excise duty (net of refunds) in the last three complete years was as follows:

Year	£	Rounded (£m)
1994–95	3,805,889,208	3,806
1995–96	4,043,599,430	4,044
1996–97	4,217,507,503	4,218

Public Bodies (Reports)

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the bodies within the responsibility of his Department currently required by legislation to lay a report before Parliament. [33553]

Angela Eagle: All the Department's executive non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs) and nationalised industries publish annual reports and accounts. All but three of these bodies were established by means of primary legislation, and for all those bodies, the legislation lays a requirement on the Secretary of State, rather than the body itself, to lay the annual reports before Parliament. Civil Servants

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will estimate the number and percentage of civil servants in his Department, at each grade including and above higher executive officer who (a) attended university and (b) attended either Oxford or Cambridge University; [33065]

(2) if he will estimate the number of civil servants in his Department, at each grade, who received their schooling in the independent school sector; [33066]

(3) if he will estimate for each of the last five years, the number and percentage of new civil servants in his Department who attended Oxford or Cambridge University, broken down into the number of entrants joining the Department from (a) the regular Civil Service entrance procedure, (b) the fast stream and (c) the private sector. [33067]

Angela Eagle: The Department does not record this information centrally and it could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Railway Industry

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 2 February 1998, Official Report, column 454, if he will make it his policy to take an equity stake in the railway industry equivalent in value to the amount of subsidy planned for the next three years. [33497]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We have no plans to make this our policy. As I made clear in my earlier answer renationalisation of the railways would be extremely costly and cannot be a priority given the other pressures on public expenditure. Our main task is to improve the railways as we found them, not as we would have wished them to be.

Building Regulations

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to extend part M of the building regulations to new dwellings; and if he will make a statement. [33901]

Mr. Raynsford: Further to my answer on 11 June 1997, Official Report, column 472 to a similar question from the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow), I am pleased to announce that Part M of the Building Regulations, covering access and facilities for disabled people, is to be extended to include new dwellings. This decision has been taken following a thorough consideration of the responses to the consultation on the subject issued by the previous administration in January 1995 and discussion with the Joseph Rowntree Foundation and the House Builders Federation. The purpose of these proposed measures is to allow people to be able to invite disabled people to visit them in their own homes, and for home owners to be able to remain in their own homes longer as they become less mobile as they get older.

The benefits of these changes will be very considerable—more than 10 million people will benefit. In particular there will be direct benefits of increased convenience, accessibility and sociability for disabled people. The measures will also help significantly those people who are temporarily disabled through accident or injury, the elderly and those with young children in prams and pushchairs.

The extension of Part M is an important measure that complements this Government's commitment to implement the remaining duties as Part III of the Disability Discrimination Act. Part III will improve disabled people's access to goods and services and Part M will ensure better access to new domestic dwellings. This is, therefore, a key obligation for this Government, which is committed to social inclusion. It is better and more cost effective for new homes to be designed and built with proper facilities—as already happens with new public and commercial buildings—than to rely on later piecemeal adjustments.

The measures to be included in the approved document will cover:

- level entry to the principal, or a suitable alternative, entrance
- an entrance door wide enough to allow wheelchair access
- WC provision on the entrance or first habitable storey
- adequate circulation and wider doors within the entrance storey
- switches and socket outlets at appropriate heights from floor level
- level or gently sloping approach from the car parking space to the dwelling, or where this is not possible, easy-going steps, but not a stepped ramp
- where a lift is to be provided in flats, minimum lift capacity and dimensions will be recommended
- where a lift is not provided the common stairs to be designed to suit the needs of the ambulant disabled.

These measures reflect those set out in the original consultation paper, although it is not proposed to make provision for a 300 mm offset inside, and next to the entrance door.

Amendment Regulations will be laid later this year which will extend Part M of the Building Regulations to cover new dwellings. A new Approved Document will be prepared in readiness for publication at the same time which will set out ways in which the requirements of the Regulations can be met, and will suggest circumstances where certain of the measures may not be appropriate.

To allow adequate time for guidance to be developed in support of the proposals, and in particular that for level thresholds, and also to allow time for building workers to become trained in the new techniques that will be necessary, it is proposed the Amendment Regulations will come into force one year after they are laid.

If, however, those building new dwellings in the intervening period were to incorporate the proposed measures voluntarily it would greatly benefit the stock of accessible housing.

Regional Airports

Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will place in the Library all responses to his Department's consultation on international access to regional airports. [30310]

Ms Glenda Jackson [pursuant to the reply, 27 February 1998, c. 400]: Following representations from regional airports, the Department has written to airlines and organisations who either operate to, or in the case of airports have regular services, to international destinations beyond the European Economic Area, seeking views on the liberalisation of access to regional airports. In conducting this exercise the Department made it clear to those airlines and organisations consulted that their responses would be treated on a commercially confidential basis. To place those responses in the House Library would breach that undertaking.

Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will place in the Library a list of (a) airlines and (b) other organisations which have been consulted by his Department for their views on international access to regional airports. [30309]

Ms Glenda Jackson [pursuant to the reply, 27 February 1998, c. 400–01]: The following airlines and organisations were included in the consultation exercise, on the basis that they either operated to, or in the case of airports had regular services to, international destinations beyond the European Economic Area:

Airtours International Limited
Air 2000 Limited
Air UK Limited (now KLM uk)
Birmingham International Airport Limited
Britannia Airways Limited
British Airports Authority plc
British Airways plc
British Mediterranean Airways Limited
British Midland Airways Limited
Caledonian Airways Limited
Civil Aviation Authority
Easyjet Limited
GB Airways Limited
Manchester Airport plc
Monarch Airlines Limited
Prestwick Airport
Virgin Atlantic Airways Limited

The consultation letter was passed, at the Department's request, by Manchester Airport to the Airport Operators Association.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Civil Servants

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the number of civil servants in his Department, at each grade, who received their schooling in the independent school sector. [33081]

Mr. Straw: This information is not collected or recorded centrally in the Home Office and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the number and percentage of civil servants in his Department, at each grade including and above higher executive officer who (a) attended university and (b) attended either Oxford or Cambridge University. [33080]

Mr. Straw: Figures for the non-Prison Service Home Office are given in the table. The information requested could be provided for the Prison Service only at disproportionate cost.

[2] Data on 8 members of the SCS is unavailable as it has not yet been placed on the Personnel Information Manpower Management System.
[3] Including specialists and other grades held to be equivalent to the core administrative grades.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate for each of the last five years, the number and percentage of new civil servants in his Department who attended Oxford or Cambridge University, broken down into the number of entrants joining the Department from (a) the regular Civil Service entrance procedure, (b) the fast stream and (c) the private sector. [33082]

Mr. Straw: The available information for the non-Prison Service Home Office is given in the table. The information requested could be provided for the Prison Service only at disproportionate cost.

Information on the nature of recruits' previous employment is not recorded centrally in the Home Office and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Since all recruitment into the Home Civil Service is governed by the Civil Service Commissioners' Recruitment Code, information about recruits who were previously employed in the private sector will be included within the figures given.

Millennium Compliance

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his assessment, based on the most recent information from the Association of Chief Police Officers, of (a) the cost and (b) the timetable for all police forces in England and Wales achieving millennium compliance. [32304]

Mr. Michael [holding answer 3 March 1998]: It is the responsibility of each police force to ensure that its information technology (IT) systems are Year 2000 compliant. In addressing the problem, forces are being assisted by the Police Information Technology Organisation (PITO), which issued guidance to all forces in May last year. The guidance was augmented by PITO-sponsored conferences for police IT managers in May and November 1997.

Information about the cost to forces of achieving compliance is not held centrally by either the Home Office or the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO). All forces are actively working to achieve compliance by the millennium. Progress is regularly reviewed by ACPO and by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary as part of its regular inspections.

Public Appointments

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the appointments to public bodies which he has made since 1 May 1997 have been from the Public Appointments Unit list. [33253]

Mr. Straw: The information requested is not held centrally within the Department, and could be assembled and collated only at disproportionate cost. Candidates for public appointments may come from a number of sources, including the Public Appointments Unit (PAU), but the fact that a person may be on the PAU list does not mean that he or she might not separately apply for an appointment, for example in response to an advertisement for a specific appointment.

Prison Places

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his oral statement of 30 July 1997, Official Report, column 341–44, on criminal justice, what estimate he has made of the likely change in the number of prison places required in England and Wales over the next 10 years. [32863]

Ms Quin [holding answer 5 March 1998]: The latest estimate of the likely change in the number of prison places required in England and Wales over the next eight years is provided in the Home Office Statistical Bulletin "Revised Projections of Long Term Trends in the Prison Population to 2005" published on 29 January 1998. Projections are not currently available beyond this eight year period.

The Bulletin estimates that the prison population will increase from the current level of around 65,000 to an average of 82,800 by 2005. This will require the Prison Service to increase capacity to hold an additional 17,800 prisoners. In addition, alternative scenarios in the projection estimate a population for 2005 of between 64,400 and 92,600.

The projections do not take into account the provisions contained in the Crime and Disorder Bill, such as home detention curfew, or the effect of the extension of electronic monitoring on a national basis.

Voluntary Sector

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to follow up the recommendations of the Diaxone Commission Report on the future of the voluntary sector; and if there have been changes in the Government's policy on the matters in the report since publication of the Government's response in "Raising the Voltage". [32878]

Mr. Michael: Working with the voluntary sector is a high priority for this Government. We have studied the findings of the Deakin Commission on the Future of the Voluntary Sector in England and consider its Report is a valuable contribution to debate about the relationship between Government and the voluntary and community sector. We agree with many of its conclusions.

We are taking a number of steps to develop this relationship. Our main vehicle for this relationship will be a Compact between Government and the voluntary sector on which we are currently collaborating with principles which should govern the relationship, and progress is being made through a Working Party of Ministers which has also considered progress towards Compact arrangements in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. In the longer term, the Government will monitor the Compact, and relations in general, through a Taskforce of Ministers chaired by my right hon. Friend.

Political Parties (Funding)

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what evidence the Government have submitted to the inquiry on the funding of political parties by the Committee on Standards in Public Life. [33903]

Mr. Straw: We have submitted a memorandum on the funding of political parties, by way of background evidence, to the Committee chaired by the Lord Neill of Bladen QC. Copies have been placed in the Library.

European Parliament

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the electoral system for elections to the European Parliament. [33900]

Mr. Straw: It is fundamentally important that any voting system is appropriate to the nature and functions of the body which is being elected. On Second Reading of the European Parliamentary Elections Bill on 25 November 1997, Official Report, column 803, I stated that the Government believed the regional list system set out in the Bill to be the most appropriate system for elections to the European Parliament in Great Britain. Under such a system, an elector may cast his vote in one of two ways—for a party list or for an independent candidate. However, having received separate representations from the Liberal Democrats and Charter 88, I undertook to listen to the arguments for adopting a system similar to that which operates in Belgium, whereby an elector may cast his vote in one of three ways—for a party list, for an individual candidate on a party list or for an independent candidate.

I have studied the matter very carefully. As part of the consideration process, I commissioned a study of voter opinion by National Opinion Polls, the results of which have been placed in the Library.

I have concluded that there is no advantage in adopting in Great Britain a system of the kind used in Belgium.

The type of system which is in use in Belgium has some superficial attractions. An elector may express a preference for a particular candidate, rather than simply endorsing all the candidates on a party's list. However, the system suffers from a fundamental and incurable weakness, in that voters' preferences for individual candidates are not necessarily translated into electoral success.

I am placing in the Library some numerical examples to illustrate how the system works in practice. These indicate that even where votes for individual candidates amount to as much as 40 per cent. of a party's total vote, those candidates receiving the fewest individual votes can be elected while those receiving the most are not. I believe that such an outcome could lead to substantial disillusionment among the electorate following an election.

The overwhelming majority of citizens in the European Union elect their Members of the European Parliament using a system of the kind for which the Bill currently provides. This seems to me to be the most suitable one to use in a situation where (as the National Opinion Poll study demonstrated) most people vote for parties rather than individuals.

The Government are committed to fulfilling their manifesto promise to put in place a proportional voting system for elections to the European Parliament. I remain convinced that the simple regional list system in the European Parliamentary Elections Bill is the most appropriate way of delivering that commitment.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Civil Servants

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Attorney-General if he will estimate for each of the last five years, the number and percentage of new civil servants in his Department who attended Oxford or Cambridge University, broken down into the number of entrants joining the Department from (a) the regular Civil Service entrance procedure, (b) the fast stream and (c) the private sector. [33097]

The Attorney-General: The full information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, in the case of lawyers in my office, the Treasury Solicitor's Department and the Serious Fraud Office who have in the last 5 years joined the Government Legal Service, I am advised that in 40 cases (32%) Oxford or Cambridge Universities have been attended and that in 85 cases another university or polytechnic has been attended.

For the same reason it is not possible to provide the further figures requested but I am advised that the great majority of new recruits come from outside the Civil Service and are selected through regular Civil Service procedures.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Attorney-General if he will estimate the number of civil servants in his Department, at each grade, who received their schooling in the independent school sector. [33096]

The Attorney-General: Figures in relation to my Departments are not readily available and the information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Attorney-General if he will estimate the number and percentage of civil servants in his Department, at each grade including and above higher executive officer who (a) attended university and (b) attended either Oxford or Cambridge University. [33095]

The Attorney-General: The information provided below relates only to lawyers in my own office, the Treasury Solicitor's Department and the Serious Fraud Office. I am advised that there are 237 such lawyers and that the information held in respect of them shows that between them they have completed 280 courses at various universities and polytechnics; some having attended more than one institution. In 89 cases (32%) the institution attended was Oxford or Cambridge University.

Figures in relation to other staff (at HEO level and above) and figures in relation to the Crown Prosecution Service could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

PRIME MINISTER

Ministerial Accommodation

Mr. Forth: To ask the Prime Minister (1) if he will list the Government Ministers currently occupying publicly owned accommodation, giving the (a) precedents, (b) rationale for such use and (c) total annual cost in each case; [24478]

(2) when he expects to reply to the question from the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst of 16 January 1998 (reference 24478) relating to Government Ministers occupying publicly owned accommodation. [33347]

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the living accommodation provided out of public funds to members of the Government; and to whom it has been granted. [26791]

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list those Ministers provided with official residential accommodation in London. [27320]

The Prime Minister: Official residences are assigned to Ministers either on grounds of security or in order to allow them to perform better their official duties.

No 10 and No 11 Downing Street have traditionally been the residences of the Prime Minister and Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Carlton Gardens has traditionally been the residence of the Foreign Secretary. The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has also traditionally been provided a flat at Hillsborough.

Other Northern Ireland Ministers have the use of Government accommodation while on duty in Northern Ireland. These costs are not separately identifiable.

Admiralty House and the Government house in Pimlico have in the past been assigned to a wide variety of Ministers including the President of the Board of Trade, the Attorney-General, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, the Lord President of the Council, the Chief Whip, the Lord Privy Seal, the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, the Paymaster General, the Minister without Portfolio, the Minister for Overseas Development, the Secretary of State for Defence, the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. Accommodation is currently occupied by the Deputy Prime Minister, the President of the Board of Trade, the Secretary of State for Defence and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

In addition the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Foreign Secretary and the Secretary of State for Scotland also have the use of Chequers, Dorneywood, Chevening and Bute House, although none of these is owned by the Government.

The Lord Chancellor has an official residence in the House of Lords which is provided in his capacity as Speaker of the House of Lords. The running costs are met by the House of Lords authorities and do not fall to Government.

The total cost to Government this year of maintaining and refurbishing all Ministerial residences is estimated at £1.1m compared with expenditure last year of £1.2m.

Millennium

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister on what basis he stated that Greenwich is the place where the millennium begins. [31845]

The Prime Minister: Greenwich is known internationally as the home of time and is the site of the zero of longitude which passes through the Millennium Experience site. The universal day starts at midnight at zero longitude and therefore the year 2000 will start at this point for all the world at midnight on 31 December 1999.

Student Loans

Mr. Willis: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral answer to the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) of 4 March 1998, Official Report, column 1049, on what basis he stated that Lord Dearing recommended that students should commence the repayment of loans when their incomes reached £5,000. [33485]

The Prime Minister: The National Committee of Inquiry into Higher Education costed a number of options, including their preferred option, on the basis that repayment of student loans would commence once a borrower's income reached £5,000 per annum.

US Visiting Forces

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister what discussions he has had with President Clinton concerning the presence of United States visiting forces in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [33569]

The Prime Minister: I have had no such discussions. However, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and his Department conduct regular discussions with the US authorities on a wide range of issues and I am kept appropriately informed.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Civil Servants

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (1) if he will estimate the number of civil servants in his Department, at each grade, who received their schooling in the independent school sector; [33093]

(2) if he will estimate the number and percentage of civil servants in his Department, at each grade including and above higher executive officer who (a) attended university and (b) attended either Oxford or Cambridge University. [33092]

Mr. Hoon: My Department does not hold this information.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will estimate for each of the last five years, the number and percentage of new civil servants in his Department who attended Oxford or Cambridge University, broken down into the number of entrants joining the Department from (a) the regular Civil Service entrance procedure, (b) the fast stream and (c) the private sector. [33094]

Mr. Hoon: (a) My Department does not hold this information. (b) The number of staff joining the Department through the fast stream each year is so small that to give this information would allow personal information regarding individuals to be identified. (c) My Department does not hold this information.

Courts (Shrewsbury)

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will undertake a feasibility study into constructing a new county court building adjacent to the Shrewsbury Crown and Magistrates Courts. [32411]

Mr. Hoon: There are no plans to undertake a feasibility study into building a new county court in Shrewsbury. For a number of years the cost of construction has prevented us from building purpose-built county courts. Instead the Department has investigated alternative methods of meeting our requirements, dependent on the availability of local accommodation.

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what estimate he has made of the level of unused capacity at Shrewsbury County Court. [32412]

Mr. Hoon: The two judge's chambers are unused for 50 per cent. of the available time. No Circuit Judge sits at the court, but the one courtroom is used occasionally by district judges.

Human Rights (Legal Aid)

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what estimate he has made of the cost in a full year of providing legal aid for those who take action under the provisions of the Human Rights Bill [Lords]. [32404]

Mr. Hoon: The Government's policy is to promote compliance by public authorities with the terms of the European Convention on Human Rights. My Department is still considering the lessons to be learned from international experiences of implementation of human rights legislation, and is consulting with other Government Departments, judges, the professions and practitioners on the practical arrangements for implementation. The aim is to manage implementation effectively, including ensuring that the judiciary and practitioners can handle human rights issues appropriately where they arise, in order to keep to a minimum any increase in court workload and legal aid costs.

Lord Chancellor's Residence

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the number of applications he has received for official tours of the Lord Chancellor's official residence to date, and from whom they were received. [33498]

Mr. Hoon: 35 written requests to visit the Lord Chancellor's official residence had been received by 6 March 1998 by the Lord Chancellor or his officials. Of these, 18 are requests by members of the public, 5 are requests from Members of Parliament on behalf of constituents and 12 are requests from societies or groups with an interest in art and architecture.

Public Bodies (Reports)

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the bodies within the responsibility of his Department currently required by legislation to lay a report before Parliament. [33551]

Mr. Hoon: The bodies for which the Lord Chancellor's Department is responsible and which are required by legislation to lay a report before Parliament are listed:

The Council on Tribunals

The Court Service

Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of the Magistrate's Courts Service

Her Majesty's Land Registry

The Law Commission

The Legal Aid Board

The Legal Services Ombudsman

The Lord Chancellor's Advisory Committee on Legal Education and Conduct

The Lord Chancellor's Legal Aid Advisory Committee (Northern Ireland)

The Public Record Office.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Piers

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many piers in the North West of England have been awarded heritage lottery funding (a) during the last 12 months and (b) since the inception of the National Lottery. [32889]

Mr. Banks: No seaside piers in the North West of England have been the subject of an award by the Heritage Lottery Fund during the last twelve months. Southport pier, which was awarded a grant of £34,000 on 5 February 1997, is so far the only pier in the North West to have received a grant from the Fund.

Tourism

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the money allocated for tourism per head for (a) England and (b) the Northern Region for the years 1995 to 1998. [32260]

Mr. Tom Clarke: My Department supports tourism in England through grant-in-aid support to the English Tourist Board, which in turn allocates funding to the ten regional tourist boards. The money allocated for tourism per head for (a) England and (b) the Northern Region for the years 1995 to 1998 are as follows:

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many Government spending programmes to date have been, or have been proposed to be, funded by the National Lottery; and if he will list each programme. [32967]

Mr. Banks: None. The Government have made it clear that the money raised by the Lottery for good causes was, and is, intended to be additional to public expenditure.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Export Licences

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many applications for export licences were circulated to her Department by the Export Control Organisation during each of the four week periods beginning (i) 3 May 1997, (ii) 31 May 1997, (iii) 28 June 1997, (iv) 26 July 1997, (v) 23 August 1997, (vi) 20 September 1997, (vii) 18 October 1997, (viii) 15 November 1997, (ix) 13 December 1997, (x) 10 January 1998 and (xi) 7 February 1998. [33372]

Clare Short: The number of Standard Individual Export Licence Applications circulated to the Department for International Development by the Export Control Organisation for the four weekly periods beginning 3 May 1997 and ending 6 March 1998 are as follows:

Pakistan

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what requests for assistance her Department has received following the recent floods in the Baluchistan province of Pakistan; and if she will make a statement. [33458]

Clare Short: The Federal Government of Pakistan have indicated that the flood situation in Baluchistan province is now under control in terms of immediate relief and supplies, but search and rescue operations are continuing. We understand from the United Nations Office for the Co-ordination of Humanitarian Affairs that the Pakistan Government have no intention of launching an international appeal for assistance as it considers the provincial Government of Baluchistan fully able to cope. The British High Commission in Islamabad is continuing to monitor the situation.

Forestry

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on her Department's policy towards forestry projects. [33106]

Clare Short: The Department for International Development's (DFID) approach to forestry is to support work to improve management of forest resources in ways that lead to a range of benefits to poor communities. My Department's aim is to help people, in particular poor people, in developing countries gain long-term benefits from their trees, while also helping secure the global environmental benefits that forests offer. For the world's poor, trees and forests are vital for everyday survival.

DFID is presently working on over 150 projects with partners in 34 countries. DFID's approach towards forestry projects is explained in "forests MATTER", a publication prepared by my Department last autumn. DFID-supported forestry projects are described in our publication "Forest Sector Projects, January 1998". Copies of both documents are being placed in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assistance her Department has given to the Indonesian government towards forestry programmes; and if she will take steps to offer assistance in respect of the recent fires in Borneo. [33107]

Clare Short: We currently support one forestry project in Indonesia which is helping develop a sustainable model of forest management which will give poor forest-dependent people greater influence, and will be seeking changes to the incentives that encourage forest to be converted to other uses. We are not involved with forests in Borneo and elsewhere in Indonesia, who are affected by the fires.

Phare and Tacis Programmes

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list those United Kingdom NGOs currently in receipt of funding under the Phare and Tacis Democracy Programmes, together with the projects concerned and the level of funding. [33303]

Clare Short: This information is not readily available. The European Commission's inventory of projects is organised on the basis of partner NGOs in Central, Southern and Eastern Europe and Central Asia, rather than on the basis of participating NGOs from European Union Member States.

Terrorism

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make it her policy not to give development assistance to countries that sponsor terrorism. [33130]

Clare Short: This Government believe that political stability both within and between countries is a necessary pre-condition for the elimination of poverty. Helping governments and societies to build the will and the capacity to resolve disputes non-violently is a central part of our international policy.

Weapons of Mass Destruction

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make it her policy not to give development assistance to countries developing a ballistic missile capability and weapons of mass destruction which are not signatories to the Non-Proliferation Treaty. [33129]

Clare Short: This Government urge all countries which have not yet done so to accede to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. My Department takes account of a number of factors in deciding on aid allocations. A full, longer-term partnership will be established only with countries who are committed to the elimination of poverty and are pursuing appropriate economic, social, environmental and political policies. That includes partner countries not diverting limited resources into excessive military expenditure.

Civil Servants

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development (1) if she will estimate the number and percentage of civil servants in her Department, at each grade including and above higher executive officer who (a) attended university and (b) attended either Oxford or Cambridge University; [33098]

(2) if she will estimate for each of the last five years, the number and percentage of new civil servants in her Department who attended Oxford or Cambridge University, broken down into the number of entrants joining the Department from (a) the regular Civil Service entrance procedure, (b) the fast stream and (c) the private sector; [33100]

(3) if she will estimate the number of civil servants in her Department, at each grade, who received their schooling in the independent school sector. [33099]

Clare Short: I regret that this information is not held centrally and could be collected only at disproportionate cost by a file by file search.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list those meetings attended by her Department with other EU ministers or officials since 1 January at which Zimbabwe was discussed. [33395]

Clare Short: I spoke to Commissioner Pinheiro about Zimbabwe and other issues on 8 January. Officials of Department for International Development and the High Commission in Harare keep in close touch with other EU representatives on a range of projects and issues.

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development, pursuant to her answer of 2 February 1998, Official Report, column 471, on Zimbabwe, if she will list those meetings between her Department and (a) the World Bank and (b) the IMF since 1 October at which Zimbabwe was discussed. [33398]

Clare Short: There are regular meetings of officials in Washington, concerning Zimbabwe and other countries. Most recently, these have included a meeting with Michael Camdessus of the IMF, who also called on me on 20 February, and with the World Bank Vice-President for Africa on 14 January. The President of World Bank also called on me on 20 February. Officials of the Department for International Development (DFID) and the High Commission in Harare also keep in touch with the IMF and World Bank local representatives, and on 22 January attended the debriefing for Heads of Mission by the IMF mission appraising a Stand By Arrangement.

Public Bodies Reports

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the bodies within the responsibility of her Department currently required by legislation to lay a report before Parliament. [33560]

Clare Short: The following bodies within the responsibility of my Department are currently required by legislation to lay a report before Parliament:

The Commonwealth Development Corporation

The Commonwealth Scholarship Commission.

Intellectual Property Rights

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development (1) if she will press for the Convention on Biological Diversity to safeguard intellectual property rights pending completion of the WTO agreement on trade-related intellectual property rights in 1999; [31989]

(2) what assessment she has made of the implications for biodiversity of the current Uruguay Round measures on agriculture and trade-related intellectual property rights; and if she will press for the Fourth Conference of the Parties on Biological Diversity to make a full evaluation of this matter. [31986]

Mr. Battle: I have been asked to reply.

In its provisions on technology transfer, the Convention on Biological Diversity specifically acknowledges the need for adequate and effective protection of intellectual property rights. The Convention also calls on parties to co-operate in ensuring that such rights are supportive of and do not run counter to the objectives of the Convention. My Department will continue to work in close collaboration with other departments to ensure that the United Kingdom plays an active and positive role in addressing the issues at the forthcoming Fourth Conference of Parties to the Convention as well as in other international negotiations.

Mr. MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the estimated cost per pupil of creating new places in education board schools. [32561]

Mr. Worthington: Based on latest available construction costs, it is estimated that the cost of creating a new place in a primary school is approximately £4,220 and in a secondary school is approximately £7,640.

Mr. MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the average cost to the public purse in 1996–97 per pupil, of (a) pupils in education board primary schools, (b) pupils in voluntary grammar schools and (c) pupils supported by the state in independent preparatory schools. [32562]

Mr. Worthington: The table details the average recurrent cost per pupil in 1996–97:

Education Board Primary Schools	1,691
Voluntary Grammar Schools	2,329
Independent Preparatory Schools	nil

Mr. MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many pupils in 1997 were in independent preparatory schools and supported by public money. [32559]

Mr. Worthington: In 1997 there were 180 pupils in the only independent preparatory school in Northern Ireland. None was supported by public money.

Investors (Grants)

Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what grants other than regional selective assistance were made available to industrial and business investors in Northern Ireland in 1997. [32555]

Mr. Ingram: Apart from selective financial assistance, which is broadly equivalent to GB's regional selective assistance, support is made available to industry and business in Northern Ireland for training, for research and development and for tourism-related purposes.

Regional Selective Assistance

Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many grants of regional selective assistance were made in Northern Ireland in 1997; how many were made at the maximum level; what was the average level; and how many jobs she estimates were created. [32554]

Mr. Ingram: The Industrial Development Board (IDB) made 91 offers of Selective Financial Assistance (SFA) with the potential of promoting 6,005 new jobs and safeguarding a further 5,577 jobs in the financial year 1996/97. The average amount of assistance offered per project was £1.74m representing an average contribution of 25% towards total project costs.

The Local Enterprise Development Unit (LEDU) made 3,774 offers of assistance to 2,652 small businesses in the financial year 1996/97. The average amount of assistance offered per project was £10,678 representing an average contribution of 19% towards project costs. In 1997 LEDU's net job creations after contractions and closures was 3,525.

There is no absolute maximum level of assistance; each case is judged on its merits.

Playing Fields

Mr. MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what measures she is taking to retain existing playing fields for school use and to expand such facilities. [32563]

Mr. Worthington: This approval of the Department of Education for Northern Ireland is required for the disposal of school playing fields. Such approval would not be given if the facilities were required to enable schools to meet curriculum responsibilities.

The Lottery Sports Fund's "Dual Use School Sports Initiative" enables schools and other educational institutions to apply for funding towards the development of sporting facilities which would be available also for regular use by the local community.

Students

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the contribution from her Department, in each of the last five years, for the education budget for students from Northern Ireland attending Scottish universities (a) for tuition fees and (b) for maintenance grants. [32266]

Mr. Worthington: Information for 1992/93 is not available. The information for the last 4 financial years is as follows:

Year	Tuition Fees	Maintenance Grants
1993–94	6,375,881	3,771,512
1994–95	4,597,639	4,246,903
1995–96	5,092,062	4,212,957
1996–97	5,494,920	4,034,137

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the estimated proportion of students from Northern Ireland attending Scottish universities who will have to pay full tuition fees when the policy of means-testing tuition fees is introduced. [32646]

Mr. Worthington: It is estimated that some twenty-five per cent. of Northern Ireland new entrants overall will pay the full fee; it is not possible to disaggregate for those attending Scottish Universities.

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proportion of the students from Northern Ireland attending Scottish universities claim the full maintenance grant. [32647]

Mr. Worthington: It is not possible to identify the number of students who claim full grant since it is determined by whether or not there is a parental, spouses or student's contribution.

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many students from Northern Ireland, in each of the last five years, began their degree courses in Scottish universities, broken down (a) by gender, (b) by individual university and (c) by maintained or controlled school at which the student sat A levels. [32265]

Mr. Worthington: Information for 1992–93 and 1993–94 is not available. The figures for the last three years are as follows:

Maternity Services

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the timescale for the amalgamation of maternity services in Belfast; what is the estimated cost of refurbishing the Royal Maternity Hospital to accommodate this change; when the capital for this will be made available; and if other capital projects will be displaced as a result. [32638]

Mr. Worthington: Detailed plans for the transfer of maternity services from the Belfast City Hospital have yet to be drawn up by the Royal Group of Hospitals Trust. The provisional target date for the amalgamation is April 1999. Estimates for the cost are not yet available. No other existing projects will be displaced to accommodate this.

Capital Projects

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much money was moved from the capital account to the revenue account in the Northern Ireland Department of Health and Social Services in the financial year ending March 1998; how much money is earmarked for such transfer in 1999 and 2000; which capital projects are being re-phased as a result of this movement of capital; and if any capital projects in the programme in 1997 have been abandoned. [32642]

Mr. Worthington: In the 1997/98 financial year £5.5 million capital was transferred to revenue.

This sum became available in 1996/97 due to unforeseen delays in on-site dates for the new Causeway Hospital and the Altnagelvin Hospital nucleus extension, and re-ordering of the redevelopment programme for the Ulster Hospital. This was carried forward to 1997/98 under the normal arrangements for managing slippage in expenditure plans. No capital projects were therefore rephased as a result of the re-distribution of resources and no projects have been abandoned.

It is anticipated that £1 million will be transferred in each of the next 2 financial years to cover the revenue costs of PFI schemes.

Health Boards and Trusts

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what targets for efficiency savings for (a) health boards and (b) health trusts have been set up by the Department of Health and Social Services for (i) the current year and (ii) 1998. [32637]

Mr. Worthington: In the current year Boards and Trusts have been set a target of 1.5% cash releasing efficiency savings. In 1998–99 Boards and Trusts will be expected to increase productivity levels by at least 1% over the year.

Hospitals

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current position on the refurbishment and extension of (a) the Down Hospital and (b) the Ulster Hospital. [32639]

Mr. Worthington: Following the decision to abandon the private finance test the Down Lisburn Trust is seeking public funding to support the development of a new hospital in Downpatrick. I have been looking at the Trust's proposal to ensure it remains appropriate and sustainable in light of developments in clinical trends and working practices as well as organisational changes in the delivery of care. I hope to conclude this shortly.

The Ulster, North Down & Ards Trust is in the process of implementing a programme of improvements at the Ulster Hospital. Funding amounting to £1.5 million has been approved for the refurbishment of the Obstetric, Accident and Emergency departments and Endoscopy Theatre.

Sexual Offences

Dr. Vis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many cases of sexual offence, under each category, were recorded in Northern Ireland for each of the last three years for which figures are available. [32819]

Mr. Ingram: The table shows the breakdown for the years 1994, 1995 and 1996. The figures for 1997 are not yet available.

Births

Dr. Vis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many women in Northern Ireland had babies at (a) 16 years and under, (b) 17 years, (c) 18 years and (d) 19 years in each of the last three years for which figures are available. [32820]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The General Register Office for Northern Ireland collects information on the number of births registered in each year. The most recent year for which information is available is 1996.

	Year of registration
Age of mother	1994	1995	1996

Public Appointments

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many of the appointments to public bodies which she has made since 1 May 1997 have been from the Public Appointments Unit list. [33243]

Mr. Paul Murphy: None of the individuals appointed to public bodies in Northern Ireland since 1 May 1997 were persons identified by the Public Appointments Unit.

WALES

Regional Selective Assistance

Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what grants other than regional selective assistance were made available to industrial and business investors in Wales in 1997. [32558]

Mr. Hain: Regional Selective Assistance is the main form of regional aid in Wales. In 1997 a total of £130 million was offered to companies in Wales. Other, smaller grant schemes administered by the Welsh Office with particular regard to small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) and to encourage innovation include Regional Enterprise Grants, Regional Innovation Grants, and the SMART, SPUR and SPUR-plus award schemes. In total just over £3 million was offered to companies under these schemes in 1997.

A range of services, including grant support, is also provided by the Welsh Development Agency, the Development Board for Rural Wales, the Wales Tourist Board, the Training and Enterprise Councils, local authorities and other business development organisations. Information on all of these is not held centrally for the period concerned.

Industrial Trends

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the latest CBI Wales "Industrial Trends" Report. [33284]

Mr. Hain: In the CBI Wales January Quarterly Industrial Trends survey, Welsh manufacturers reported a less sharp fall in general business optimism than was the case in the UK as a whole. Similarly, there was a moderate fall in orders, which are expected to pick up during the present quarter.

Public Bodies (Reports)

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the bodies within the responsibility of his Department currently required by legislation to lay a report before Parliament. [33559]

Mr. Ron Davies: The list of bodies within the responsibility of my Department currently required by legislation to lay a report before Parliament are:

Sustainable Development

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received on a sustainable development duty from the Welsh Development Agency. [33391]

Mr. Hain: No representations on this subject have been received from the Welsh Development Agency.

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to produce a new sustainable development strategy for Wales; and if he will make a statement. [33390]

Mr. Win Griffiths: On 4 February the Government published "Opportunities for Change", a consultation paper on a revised UK strategy for sustainable development: we plan to publish the new UK strategy by the end of the year. I hope that there will be wide participation in the consultation process from across Wales.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has moved an amendment to the Government of Wales Bill requiring the National Assembly for Wales to make a scheme setting out its proposals for securing that its functions are exercised with due regard to the principle that sustainable development should be promoted. The scheme will be published and the Assembly will be required to keep it under review. The question of a sustainable development strategy for Wales will be for the Assembly to decide.

Civil Servants

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will estimate the number and percentage of civil servants in his Department, at each grade including and above higher executive officer who (a) attended university and (b) attended either Oxford or Cambridge University; [33086]

(2) if he will estimate the number of civil servants in his Department, at each grade, who received their schooling in the independent school sector; [33087]

(3) if he will estimate for each of the last five years, the number and percentage of new civil servants in his Department who attended Oxford or Cambridge University, broken down into the number of entrants joining the Department from (a) the regular Civil Service entrance procedure, (b) the fast stream and (c) the private sector. [33088]

Mr. Ron Davies: The information requested is not held centrally by my Department.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Drugs

36. Mr. Bayley: To ask the President of the Council what recent representations she has received about the Government's policies to combat the misuse of drugs. [31442]

Mrs. Ann Taylor: I regularly receive correspondence on this issue from Members of Parliament and their constituents, and have also heard views from members of the public during recent engagements around the country.

In addition, Keith Hellawell—the UK Anti-Drugs Coordinator—has coordinated an extensive consultation process to inform his proposals for a new anti-drugs strategy.

Public Bodies (Reports)

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the President of the Council if she will list the bodies within the responsibility of her Department currently required by legislation to lay a report before Parliament. [33562]

Mrs. Ann Taylor: Under the relevant Acts, the General Medical Council, the General Dental Council, the General Optical Council, and the General Osteopathic Council are required to provide annual accounts and auditors' reports for laying before Parliament.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Recesses (Dates)

37. Mr. Randall: To ask the President of the Council what plans she has to announce the date of each periodic adjournment at the start of the session. [31443]

Mrs. Ann Taylor: I have sought to give the House advance notice of recess dates as far as I am able. Indeed, I gave a broad indication about the Easter Recess in the first sitting week after Christmas.

Mr. MacShane: To ask the President of the Council if she will make it her policy to timetable 12 months in advance parliamentary recesses. [31444]

Mrs. Ann Taylor: The approximate periods each year when the House sits and does not sit are generally known. To give more precise dates for a whole year ahead would deny the House the flexibility which is an important part of our system.

Select Committees

38. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the President of the Council if she will review the operation of Standing Order No. 152(4)(e) with particular reference to the Foreign Affairs and International Development Select Committees. [31445]

Mrs. Ann Taylor: I am not aware of any problems in arranging concurrent meetings of these two committees.

New Deal (Young People)

39. Mr. Mitchell: To ask the President of the Council to ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), representing the House of Commons Commission, what plans the Commission has to offer jobs to young people under the new deal. [31446]

Mr. Kirkwood: Recruitment of staff is a matter for Heads of individual Departments of the House but I understand that the possibility of taking on Welfare to Work trainees is being actively considered and if appropriate places exist, young trainees could be in place in the early summer.

Adjournment Debates

40. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the President of the Council what plans she has to increase the opportunities for Back-Bench hon. Members to take part in Adjournment debates; and if she will make a statement. [31447]

Mrs. Ann Taylor: The Modernisation Committee will shortly be considering the parliamentary calendar, but at the moment I have no specific plans to increase the number of Adjournment debates.

Disabled Access

Ms Perham: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what measures have been (a) taken and (b) planned to assist access to the Palace of Westminster by people with disabilities; and if he will make a statement. [33804]

Sir Sydney Chapman: In 1993 the Accommodation and Works Committee considered a specialist's report with detailed proposals on facilities for people with disabilities in the Palace of Westminster. The Committee also took evidence from the All-Party Disablement Group and English Heritage. In deciding what should be done, the Committee sought to make possible dignified access for people with disabilities to the various parts of the building, while taking into account the need to preserve the historic fabric of the Palace.

A paper giving details of the individual schemes which were agreed by Committees of the two Houses has been placed in the Library. The cost of implementing all the recommendations proposed was estimated at £1,272,700. The improvements, taken together, give the following facilities:

The new entrance at Black Rod's Garden enables people in wheelchairs to go directly to the start of the Line of Route.

The ramps in Star Chamber Court allow people in wheelchairs access to the Strangers' Gallery via lift number 1.

The new ramps at Commons Court and the Medals Corridor enable wheelchairs to be taken on to the Terrace, to the private dining rooms, and via lift number 15 to the principal floor and the committee rooms on the first and second floors.

There are special lavatories for people with disabilities on each floor in the following locations: centre curtain corridor, lower waiting hall, opposite committee room 7 and opposite committee room 19 on the upper committee corridor.

There are inductive loops in both Chambers, in all committee rooms except those designated for secure meetings, in the Grand Committee Room, and in the Crypt Chapel. Portable headsets are available on loan from the doorkeepers and from the pulpit on the main committee corridor.

Areas where access for people with disabilities is most difficult are the Grand Committee Room, Jubilee Room and Westminster Hall meeting rooms. The Accommodation and Works Committee recommended that to avoid damage to the historic fabric of the Hall, we should wait until Westminster Hall Cafeteria is converted to a Visitor Centre and at that time install wheelchair ramps, a lift to the Grand Committee Room and a lavatory for people with disabilities. For the interim, a chairlift has been installed on the staircase from Westminster Hall to the Grand Committee Room.

Plans are being prepared to install handrails in the galleries of the House of Commons Chamber. Details will be submitted to the Accommodation and Works Committee in due course.

In Portcullis House there will be a wheelchair ramp at the main entrance. Lifts will reach floors 1–5 and there will be lavatories on those levels for people with disabilities. There will, however, be six Members' rooms on the sixth floor which will be reached only by spiral staircase.

Family Room

Mr. Brake: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee if he will list expenditure on the Family Room for each of the last five years. [33334]

Sir Sydney Chapman: The only substantial expenditure on the Family Room in recent years was made in 1997–98 and was £9,525 exclusive of VAT. The works included furnishings and the refurbishment of the side room.

Ministerial Documents

Mr. Corbett: To ask the President of the Council if she will ensure that all documents released after a Ministerial statement are made available at Vote Office outlets throughout the parliamentary precinct at the same time as they become available in the Members' Lobby. [33512]

Mrs. Ann Taylor: No. It is a long-standing custom of the House that embargoed documents remain in the custody of the Deliverer of the Vote in the Main Vote Office until the time specified for release by the Minister responsible for the document's production, so as to ensure that such documents receive the secure handling they require. Documents which are not embargoed but have a special release time on them are normally available simultaneously in the Main Vote Office and in the Vote Office in other buildings.

DEFENCE

Women (Army Employment Opportunities)

11. Ms Christine Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps the Government are taking to expand employment opportunities for women in the Army. [31413]

Mr. George Robertson: The Government are committed to maximising career opportunities for women in the Army, consistent with the need to maintain combat effectiveness. On 27 October I announced that, from 1 April this year, the number of Regular Army posts open to women will increase from 47% to 70%. I have also commissioned a review to look at how opportunities for women across the Armed Forces can be expanded still further.

British Beef

13. Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on progress in his Department's working group to encourage the purchase of British beef. [31415]

Mr. Spellar: The working group has been looking in particular at our product specifications and range to ensure that there are no unnecessary obstacles to British beef products. The meetings have been open and constructive and are continuing. I have also had discussions recently with my noble Friend Lord Donoughue, the Parliamentary Secretary, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. He has agreed that his Department should approach the European Commission with a view to releasing stocks of British beef held by the intervention boards for use by the armed forces, at a competitive price.

25. Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his plans to encourage the purchase of British beef for the armed forces and civilian personnel under his control. [31428]

Mr. Spellar: With respect to the purchase of beef for the Armed Forces, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Clwyd (Mr. Ruane) earlier today. My Department does not purchase food for civilian personnel.

Women Fighter Pilots

14. Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many women fighter pilots are (a) in service and (b) in training. [31416]

Dr. Reid: As at 1 February 1998, there were 4 female Fast Jet pilots in service and a further 17 female potential Fast Jet pilots undergoing training in the Royal Air Force.

Recruitment

15. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received relating to problems arising in respect of recruitment. [31417]

Dr. Reid: A number of representations have been received from hon. Members, interested bodies, and members of the public, on a range of issues relating to recruitment to the Armed Forces.

Heavy Lift Transport Aircraft

16. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the integral heavy lift air transport capability within the RAF in recent middle east operations. [31418]

Mr. George Robertson: The recent deployment of UK forces to the Middle East was supported by RAF owned air transport assets. These were augmented by the charter of Antonov 124 aircraft.

On the more general question of our assessment of the effectiveness of our air transport fleet, I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 1 December 1997, Official Report, column 11.

Defence Medical Services

17. Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what changes are currently proposed to the Defence Medical Services; and what further changes he anticipates. [31419]

Dr. Reid: I refer the hon. Member to the oral answer I gave the hon. Member for Basildon (Angela Smith) earlier today.

Horseshoe Barracks

18. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future use of the Horseshoe barracks in Shoeburyness. [31420]

Mr. Spellar: Horseshoe Barracks will be offered for disposal by my Department, provided that no further defence use can be found for the site. Use of Horseshoe Barracks, after disposal, is a matter for the Local Planning Authority to decide, following public consultation.

Territorial Army

19. Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the need to maintain the current number of TAVR infantry battalions. [31422]

Dr. Reid: We are looking at all the Arms of the Territorial Army, including the Infantry, in the context of the Strategic Defence Review. It is too early for me to say what the outcome of this assessment will prove to be for the size and structure of any particular Arm.

20. Sir Geoffrey JohnsonSmith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current level of TAVR manpower. [31423]

Dr. Reid: On 1 January the strength of the Territorial Army was 55,387. The future size and shape of the Territorial Army will be determined by the Strategic Defence Review.

Trident

21. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future role of Trident. [31424]

Mr. George Robertson: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 2 February 1998, Official Report, column 468.

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total lifetime cost of deploying the Trident nuclear capability. [31573]

Mr. George Robertson: The total procurement cost for Trident is estimated to be some £12.6 billion (1996–97 prices). Average running costs have been estimated at £200 million a year over the 30 year lifetime of the system. We are currently examining the basis upon which cost estimates have been calculated in the light of operating experience and as part of the wider Strategic Defence Review.

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on negotiations with the USA concerning changes to the Trident warhead. [31574]

Mr. George Robertson: There are no negotiations with the US over upgrading or enhancing our Trident warhead and we have no requirement for any such upgrade. The United Kingdom will maintain close contact with the US to help to ensure our ability to underwrite the safety and reliability of our Trident warheads throughout their service life.

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to (a) upgrade or (b) replace the Trident warhead. [31576]

Mr. George Robertson: The UK has no plans to upgrade or improve the capabilities of our Trident nuclear warhead. Any decision on a successor to the warhead will be taken in the light of the progress towards the Government's goal of verifiable global nuclear disarmament.

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he will take to inform the public about his plans for the future development of Trident missiles. [31577]

Mr. George Robertson: The UK has no current requirement or plans for any development of the Trident D5 missile.

Gulf (Deployment)

22. Mr. Bradshaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the cost of recent United Kingdom deployment in the Gulf; and what steps have been taken to elicit contributions from other countries. [31425]

Mr. George Robertson: The most recent estimate of the additional costs incurred up to late February for the UK forces deployed to the Gulf during the recent crisis amounts to some £3 million. The overall figure will depend on the length of the deployment.

Other countries have either contributed military forces of their own or have provided material support for UK forces, or have offered to do so.

The UK has not sought financial contributions towards the cost of the operation but has received host national support from several countries in the region.

Parachute Regiment

23. Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to merge the Parachute Regiment with 24 Airmobile Brigade; and if he will make a statement. [31426]

Dr. Reid: We are looking at a number of options regarding the future structure of the Army in the context of the Strategic Defence Review. I cannot say at this stage what our final decisions will be.

Prisoners of War

24. Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will initiate an independent inquiry into the pay of officer prisoners of war during the Second World War. [31427]

Mr. Spellar: I refer the hon. Member to the oral answer I gave today to the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb). There are no grounds for examining this subject again.

27. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will review his policy on the claims for compensation for loss of pay from former prisoners of war. [31430]

Mr. Spellar: This is an issue not of compensation but of whether there are outstanding payments. I refer the hon. Member to the oral answer I gave today to the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb).

Defence Diplomacy

26. Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what part preventive deployment plays in his Department's policy of defence diplomacy. [31429]

Mr. George Robertson: Defence Diplomacy is an evolving concept covering the means by which our Armed Forces can help shape a more secure and stable world. It does not include operational deployments and is therefore complementary to preventive deployments as a means of conflict prevention.

War Criminals (Former Yugoslavia)

28. Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on progress towards apprehending suspected war criminals in the former Yugoslavia. [31431]

Mr. George Robertson: Twenty four people indicted for war crimes by the International Criminal Tribunal are now in custody in The Hague. A further three people have been released following consideration of their cases and three indictees are dead. I am encouraged that almost half of those in custody went to The Hague voluntarily, most recently the Bosnian Serb, Dragoljub Kunarac, who surrendered on 4 March. A further 49 people know they have been indicted. They too should surrender. They will receive a fair trial in The Hague.

Minimum Wage

29. Mr. Forth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the evidence his Department provided to the Low Pay Commission relating to the minimum wage. [31432]

Mr. George Robertson: The Government's evidence to the Low Pay Commission was submitted on 30 January 1998, and a copy is in the Library of the House. My Department did not provide separate evidence to the Low Pay Commission.

Defence Diversification

30. Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the Government's plans for defence diversification. [31433]

Mr. Spellar: We published a Green Paper setting out our proposals on defence diversification on 5 March. These are based on developing the role of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency in promoting the wider application of defence technology for civil use, as we promised in our election manifesto. We have invited comments from all interested parties, by 8 May, before a final decision is taken on the way ahead.

Royal Military Police

31. Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on rationalisation studies affecting the Royal Military Police. [31434]

Dr. Reid: A study by the Army Training and Recruiting Agency (ATRA) into the scope for rationalisation of training provided by the Adjutant General's Corps Training Group, of which the Royal Military Police Training School at Chichester is a part, is currently being undertaken. This study has completed its initial phase of work and I will write to the hon. Member shortly.

Humanitarian Demining

32. Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps his Department is taking to help those involved in humanitarian demining. [31437]

Mr. George Robertson: I refer my hon. Friend to the oral answer I gave today to my hon. Friends the Members for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sarwar) and for Warrington, South (Ms Southworth).

Smart Procurement

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of potential savings from his departmental budget through the introduction of smart procurement. [31408]

Mr. George Robertson: I refer the hon. Member to the oral answer I gave today to my hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton).

Visiting Forces

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total number of visiting forces other than those from the United States of America based in the United Kingdom; and where are they located. [33572]

(2) if he will list the RAF bases where no United States visiting forces are based; [33565]

(3) if he will list the total number of United States visiting forces based in the United Kingdom; and if he will indicate where they were based for each year from 1985 to 1996. [33566]

Dr. Reid: I will write to the hon Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had since 1 May 1997 with United States nationals concerning the numbers and functions of United States visiting forces present in the United Kingdom. [33568]

Dr. Reid: Matters relating to the presence of the US Visiting Force are the subject of regular discussions between MOD officials and representatives of the UK Government.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his policy in respect of the presence in the United Kingdom of United States visiting forces within his Department's establishments. [33545]

Dr. Reid: We welcome the US Visiting Forces' presence in the United Kingdom which forms an important part of the United States' continuing commitment to the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and the security of Europe. We also welcome the contribution that the US force provides to United Nations peacekeeping and humanitarian aid operations.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 2 March 1998, Official Report, column 490, if he will identify at which establishment the presence of United States visiting forces is not directly to fulfil a NATO function. [33567]

Dr. Reid: All members of the US Visiting Force based in the United Kingdom are available to undertake tasks in support of NATO.

Public Bodies (Reports)

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the bodies within the responsibility of his Department currently required by legislation to lay a report before Parliament. [33552]

Dr. Reid: There are several Agencies and one Non Departmental Public Body (NDPB) currently required by legislation to lay a report before Parliament. Agencies required to do so are:

Army Base Storage and Distribution Agency
Army Technical Support Agency
Defence Animal Centre

Defence Evaluation and Research Agency
Defence Postal and Courier Service
Defence Transport and Movements Executive Disposal Sales Agency
Duke of York's Royal Military School
Hydrographic Office
Logistic Information Systems Agency
Meteorological Office

Pay and Personnel Agency
Queen Victoria School
RAF Signals Engineering Establishment
RAF Training Group
Service Children's Education

The Oil and Pipelines Agency is the only NDPB currently required by legislation to lay a report before Parliament.

Suez Crisis

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give General Service medals to those who served during the Suez Crisis. [32994]

Mr. Spellar: The joint Anglo/French amphibious operation to occupy the Suez Canal Zone, designated Operation Musketeer, which took place during the Crisis of late 1956, was recognised by the institution of the General Service Medal with clasp Near East. Qualification was one day's service between 31 October and 22 December 1956 inclusive, as laid down in Command Paper 190 of June 1957.

Service performed during the earlier Suez Canal Zone Emergency between 1951 and 1954 was not recognised by a campaign medal. The Government have no plans to consider the retrospective institution of an award for that period of service.

Active Service

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the criteria for military campaigns to be classified as active service. [32996]

Dr. Reid: The definition of "on active service" is laid down by statute in the Service Discipline Acts. A force on active service is one engaged in operations against the enemy, or engaged elsewhere than in the United Kingdom in operations for the protection of life or property, or (subject to the provisions of the relevant section in the three Acts) is in military occupation of a foreign country. In relation to a person, it means that he or she is serving in or with a force which is on active service.

Space Technology

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library a copy of the strategic alliance agreement signed between the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency and Matra Marconi Space UK Ltd., for close collaboration in identifying research and technology programmes in space and spacecraft propulsion. [32386]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 4 March 1998]: The strategic alliance agreement signed between the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency and Matra Marconi Space UK Ltd., is commercial-in-confidence. I am therefore withholding this information under exemption 7 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Strategic Defence Review

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received from the West Country about the impact on confidence among the Armed Forces of the lack of a specific date for concluding the Strategic Defence Review. [32877]

Mr. George Robertson: I am not aware of any representations from the West Country concerning the timing of the announcement of the conclusions of the Strategic Defence Review and its impact on confidence among the Armed Forces.

Army Horses

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Army horses were unavailable for military duties following accidents sustained while taking part in the hunting of foxes with hounds in each of the last three years. [33518]

Mr. Spellar: This information is not held centrally but we are aware that in the last three years, four Army horses have been unavailable for military duties for a period following injuries sustained while fox hunting.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost to public funds of treating Army horses for injuries sustained while taking part in the hunting of foxes with hounds in each of the past three years. [33519]

Mr. Spellar: This information is not kept centrally but I understand that the cost to public funds of treating horses for such injuries is not likely to have been significant.

Civil Servants

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will estimate the number and percentage of civil servants in his Department, at each grade including and above higher executive officer who (a) attended university and (b) attended either Oxford or Cambridge University; [33053]

(2) if he will estimate the number of civil servants in his Department, at each grade, who received their schooling in the independent school sector; [33054]

(3) if he will estimate for each of the last five years, the number and percentage of new civil servants in his Department who attended Oxford or Cambridge University, broken down into the number of entrants joining the Department from (a) the regular Civil Service entrance procedure, (b) the fast stream and (c) the private sector. [33055]

Mr. Spellar: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Veterans' Unit

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to establish a veterans' unit within his Department; and if he will make a statement. [32949]

Dr. Reid: My Department is aware of proposals put forward in the past by The Royal British Legion for the creation of an ex-Services Affairs Unit or Department of Veterans Affairs. I will be meeting the Secretary General of The Royal British Legion on 11 March and am looking forward to hearing their latest proposals. We will consider the way ahead in the light of these discussions.

Low Flying Exercises

Mr. White: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals he has to restrict low flying exercises in areas where the local communities have consistently complained about them; and what plans he has to review the policy for deciding where such exercises are held. [31496]

Mr. Spellar: None. Most parts of the United Kingdom, are used by military aircraft undertaking essential low flying training. We aim to do all we can to minimise disturbance by spreading the activity as widely as practicable throughout the United Kingdom and have no plans to change this arrangement.

Bosnia

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the United Kingdom's contribution to the NATO Centre for Lessons Learned in Bosnia. [32385]

Mr. George Robertson [holding answer 4 March 1998]: There is no specific NATO centre for the analysis of lessons learned from Bosnia. Studies have been undertaken by NATO at various levels to capture the politico-military and military lessons from the Implementation Force (IFOR) deployment and transition to the Stabilisation Force (SFOR). These studies have included work by NATO HQ in Brussels, by a temporary analysis team at the NATO HQ at Northwood, by the Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers Europe (SHAPE) and by the Allied Command Europe (ACE) Rapid Reaction Corps (ARRC) HQ. The United Kingdom has contributed to these either directly or through the contribution of UK personnel in NATO appointments.

Works of Art

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many works of art he has borrowed for use in his offices and official residence; which organisations he has borrowed these works from; what the insurance value is of these works; what guidance he received on the acquisition of these works; if the works have yet been removed for temporary public exhibition elsewhere; and if the works have been or will be replaced on a regular basis. [31556]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 27 February 1998]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has retained in his office four works of art which were in place when he took up his appointment. Three are from the Ministry of Defence collection and one is on loan from the National Maritime Museum. My right hon. Friend has also recently chosen twenty-four works for the flat which he occupies in Admiralty House, twelve to be loaned from the Government Art Collection and twelve to be loaned by my Department's own collection.

Under Treasury rules, the Government normally bear their own risk. Works of art belonging to Government Departments are not insured and so neither my Department nor the Government Art Collection has insurance values for these works. In general, works on loan from private lenders and from institutions that are not directly Government funded are covered by the Government Indemnity Scheme.

Formal advice on the selection of works of art is given by the Government Art Collection and by the Registrar of my Department's collection.

It is normal practice of both the Government Art Collection and my Department to make works of art available for public exhibition on request from organisers of appropriate exhibitions. No such request has yet been made for the works of art selected by my right hon. Friend.

Works of art in all Government offices are changed as and when circumstances require.

Counter Battery Radar Project

Laura Moffatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the Counter Battery Radar project. [33879]

Mr. Spellar: I am pleased to inform the House that a contract for the Industrialisation and Production phase of the Counter Battery Radar project, COBRA, covering the requirements of France, Germany and the UK, was signed on 6 March 1998. The contract, valued in total at approximately £350 million, was placed with Euro-Art, a consortium consisting of Thompson CSF, SI Sicherungstechnik, RACAL and Lockheed Martin.

COBRA will provide the Army with the capability to locate and classify hostile rockets, guns and mortars accurately and at long range, and will act as a force detector. It will also be able to monitor breaches of ceasefire when deployed in a peacekeeping role.

The project is a good example of the benefits of collaboration with our European partners, and has given us the opportunity to procure technologically advanced equipment at a considerably lower cost than would have been the case had we pursued a purely national programme. The contract will result in around 8 years of work for British industry.

Truck Cargo Heavy Duty Vehicles

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many unscheduled stops there have been involving truck cargo heavy duty mark 2 vehicles since 1 March 1994; and if he will list the (a) dates, (b) location, (c) length of delay and (d) circumstances of each stop; [32229]

(2) if he will make a statement on the (a) mechanical problems with and (b) alterations made to truck cargo heavy duty mark 2 vehicles since 1 March 1994. [32230]

Mr. Spellar: Since 1 March 1994, there have been 24 occasions on which the Truck Cargo Heavy Duty (TCHD) Mk 2 vehicles were obliged to make unscheduled stops to deal with technical problems. The circumstances are set out in table 1. Details of mechanical problems and alterations since 1 March 1994 are set out in table 2.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Public Bodies (Reports)

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the bodies within the responsibility of his Department currently required by legislation to lay a report before Parliament. [33558]

Dr. Howells: The Non Departmental Public Bodies currently required by legislation to lay a report before Parliament are: British Educational Communications and Technology Agency, formerly the National Council for Educational Technology, Construction Industry Training Board, Education Assets Board, Engineering Construction Industry Training Board, Equal Opportunities Commission, Funding Agency for Schools, Further Education Funding Council, Higher Education Funding Council for England, Qualifications and Curriculum Authority, the Teacher Training Agency.

Cannabis

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what new proposals he has to discourage the use of cannabis by school children. [31440]

Ms Estelle Morris: Resources are available in 1998–99 to schools and the youth service for drug education (including that related to cannabis) through the Standards Fund, and have just been increased to £7 million.

Certain aspects of drug education are already a statutory requirement for all pupils aged 5 to 16, as part of the National Curriculum science Order. It is for individual schools to consider whether, and if so how, they might wish to extend provision of drug education beyond this statutory minimum. We would expect all drug education programmes, however, to give pupils the facts about drugs, including cannabis, emphasise a healthy lifestyle and to give young people the knowledge and skills to make informed and responsible choices now and later in life.

Civil Servants

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) if he will estimate the number and percentage of civil servants in his Department, at each grade including and above higher executive officer who (a) attended university and (b) attended either Oxford or Cambridge University; [33062]

(2) if he will estimate for each of the last five years, the number and percentage of new civil servants in his Department who attended Oxford or Cambridge University, broken down into the number of entrants joining the Department from (a) the regular Civil Service entrance procedure, (b) the fast stream and (c) the private sector; [33064]

(3) if he will estimate the number of civil servants in his Department, at each grade, who received their schooling in the independent school sector. [33063]

Dr. Howells: This information can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will rearrange his proposed meeting with the relatives of the victims of the Lockerbie air disaster. [33337]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary greatly regrets it was necessary to postpone his meeting with the Lockerbie families because of the serious situation in Kosovo. He fully intends to meet them as soon as possible.

Iran

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations with Iran; and what initiatives he proposes to improve relations between Iran and the EU during the presidency. [33316]

Mr. Fatchett: At its meeting on 23 February the European Council agreed that, in light of recent developments in Iran, the EU should respond by, as a first step, increasing the level of political contact with Iran including lifting the ban on official bilateral Ministerial visits. The EU is now considering how political contacts between the EU and Iran, covering both areas of EU concern and issues of mutual interest, might develop.

The Council also reviewed progress in the areas of concern to the EU, namely weapons of mass-destruction, terrorism, Iran's attitude to the Middle East Peace Process and human rights including the fatwa against Salman Rushdie. The EU reaffirmed the importance of fully implementing its existing security measures and of its continued vigilance in these matters and agreed that Iran's willingness to address EU concerns would greatly enhance the success of the dialogue and Iran's reintegration into the international community.

Public Appointments

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many of the appointments to public bodies which he has made since 1 May 1997 have been from the Public Appointments Unit list. [33255]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: None. This Department is responsible for appointments to seven bodies which are classed as Non-Departmental Public Bodies (NDPBs). The number of appointments to them is very small. We seek nominations of candidates for these appointments using a wide range of sources, including the Public Appointments Unit and advertising.

UN Security Council

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of proposals (a) to increase the number of permanent members and (b) to make other alterations to the composition of the UN Security Council; and if he will make a statement. [33292]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We welcome the debate in the United Nations on Security Council enlargement. We want to see an early enlargement of the Council to make it more representative, without compromising its effectiveness. We support an increase in both permanent and non-permanent categories. We support permanent seats for Germany and Japan and for developing countries in Africa, Asia and Latin America and the Caribbean.

UN Resolutions

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will ask the United Nations to review those resolutions which remain unimplemented distinguishing between (a) those which are otiose and (b) those with a continuing relevance with a view to retabling the latter. [33132]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The UN Security Council, in the course of discharging its responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, frequently recalls and reaffirms its earlier resolutions where these continue to be relevant.

The General Assembly also reaffirms its earlier Resolutions as appropriate.

Kashmir

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to use the UK presidency of the EU to draw attention to the human rights abuses in Kashmir; and what initiatives he is proposing to help secure a settlement of the dispute. [33259]

Mr. Fatchett: We will work with EU partners to ensure that Kashmir is raised during the UN Commission on Human Rights. Our High Commissioner in New Delhi plans to lead a delegation of EU Troika missions to Kashmir in May. They will assess and report on the situation on the ground, including human rights problems. The Government's policy towards Kashmir was set out in my answer to the hon. Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) on 25 November 1997, Official Report, column 474.

Nepal and Bhutan

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the UK will press for a resolution at the UN Commission on Human Rights which will urge the governments of Nepal and Bhutan to find a just and lasting solution to the refugee problem. [33239]

Mr. Fatchett: No, but we will work with EU partners to ensure that this problem is raised in EU statements during the UN Commission on Human Rights.

Kosovo

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Serbia concerning violence in Kosovo. [33151]

Mr. Tony Lloyd [holding answer 6 March 1998]: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary called on FRY President Milosevic and FRY Foreign Minister Jovanovic in Belgrade on 5 March to express the EU's grave concern at the situation in Kosovo and at reports my right hon. Friend received that day of further repressive violence by the Serb military police.

Arms Sales

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to monitor the end user and final destination of arms sales to countries with poor human rights records. [33459]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Under the criteria announced by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on 28 July 1997, Official Report columns 26–29, an export licence will not be issued if there is a clearly identifiable risk that the proposed export might be used for internal repression. This applies to equipment where there is reason to believe that it will be diverted from its stated end-use or end-user for internal repression. Work is in hand to identify ways to minimise that risk, such as end-use monitoring, and an announcement will be made in due course.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made by (a) Her Majesty's Government and (b) NATO, in respect of the status of nuclear weapons in the list of weapons covered by the proposed international criminal court. [33262]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) set out the Government's position in respect of the inclusion of crimes involving nuclear weapons within the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court in the answer he gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) on 10 February 1998, Official Report, columns 139–40. We have made the UK's position on this subject plain at meetings of the Preparatory Committee and elsewhere. NATO has not taken a position on the matter and has made no representations.

Public Bodies (Report)

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the bodies within the responsibility of his Department currently required by legislation to lay a report before Parliament. [33557]

Mr. Fatchett: The only such body is the Foreign Compensation Commission whose annual report is laid by the Secretary of State before Parliament under Section 6(2) of the Foreign Compensation Act 1950.

Cornish Language

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will ratify the European Charter on Regional and Minority Languages. [31575]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Having assessed the benefits of the United Kingdom's signature and ratification of the Council of Europe Charter on Regional or Minority Languages, the relevant Government Departments are actively taking forward this question with a view to an early announcement.

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the effect that signing the European Charter on Regional and Minority Languages would have on the prospects for the Cornish Language. [31572]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I refer the hon. Member to my previous answer. Consideration will include the position of the Cornish language.

Tokyo Summit

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what date the EU/Japan Summit announced for January took place in Tokyo; if a United Kingdom Minister attended; and if he will publish the text of any communiqué issued. [33392]

Mr. Fatchett: The EU/Japan Summit took place on 12 January 1998 in Tokyo. The Prime Minister was present at the Summit in his role as President of the European Council. A joint EU/Japan press statement was issued on 12 January 1998. I am placing copies in the Libraries of the House.

General System of Preferences

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress he has made during the presidency of the EU on reaching agreement on amendments to the General System of Preferences. [33394]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Two proposals have been under discussion to extend the coverage of the General System of Preferences (GSP):

one, to bring product coverage of the GSP scheme closer to that available to the African, Caribbean and Pacific (ACP) group under the Lomé Convention. There is EU agreement to this, subject to a Parliamentary Scrutiny reserve by France; the other, to grant additional market access preferences to those countries which comply with the principles of relevant International Labour Organisation and/or International Tropical Timber Organisation standards. We hope to have EU agreement on this by the end of April.

During our Presidency, we also expect the Commission to produce proposals for a mid-term review of the existing GSP industrial and agricultural schemes. We shall be seeking to improve the market access benefits available under both.

ACP Countries

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress he has made during the Presidency of the EU on agreeing the EU mandate for the negotiations with the ACP countries on a successor to the Lomé Convention. [33393]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The Commission presented a draft mandate to the Council on 29 January. The UK has been steering discussion of that draft in the Council. I believe that we have a good basis for reaching agreement on a mandate during our Presidency.

Cuba

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made during the UK presidency of the EU in developing the EU common position on Cuba. [33396]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Under the UK Presidency, EU missions in Havana have broadened the range of areas in which they work closely together, including human rights, aid, commercial, environmental and consular matters, involving Cuban officials (where possible) and dissident groups. We are assessing the Pope's visit. We will evaluate progress in June.

Israel, Gaza and West Bank

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he intends to visit Israel, Gaza and the West Bank. [33397]

Mr. Fatchett: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will be visiting Israel, Gaza and the West Bank on 17–18 March. This will be part of a wider visit to the region.

China

Mr. Howard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the voting intentions of the Government on United Nations resolutions relating to human rights in China. [33467]

Mr. Fatchett: European Union Foreign Ministers decided on 23 February that neither the Presidency nor Member States should table or co-sponsor a draft resolution on China at this year's Commission on Human Rights, and if the situation arose, EU delegations should vote against a no-action motion.

MINISTER WITHOUT PORTFOLIO

Millennium Experience

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister without Portfolio if exhibits relating to unemployment and homelessness will be included in the Millennium Experience. [31522]

Mr. Mandelson: The Millennium Experience will reflect the lives and aspirations of people from all backgrounds and walks of life, from right across the United Kingdom.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister without Portfolio what will be the seating capacity of the smaller dome on the Millennium Experience site. [31523]

Mr. Mandelson: This facility would seat between 5,000 and 6,000 people.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister without Portfolio how long exhibitors will be contracted to keep their exhibits in the Millennium Experience; and if arrangements will be made for them to be exhibited in other parts of the country afterwards. [31649]

Mr. Mandelson: The Millennium Experience is due to run from 31 December 1999 to 31 December 2000. That is the basis on which the New Millennium Experience Company is planning the project and taking forward negotiations with sponsors of the content. A number of possibilities exist for subsequent use of the Dome and display of its content. Final decisions are not however likely before 2000, when the full potential of the Millennium Experience will be clearly apparent.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister without Portfolio for what reasons the exhibition zones (a) Trans Action, (b) Shared Ground, (c) Atmosphere, (d) Time to Talk and (e) UK @ Now have not yet been displayed; and who is to sponsor them. [31876]

Mr. Mandelson: The New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) revealed plans for the content of seven zones of the Millennium Dome on 24 February. NMEC are also working with designers and confirmed and potential sponsors on the remaining exhibition zones, and announcements will be made to the House in due course.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister without Portfolio if he will list the companies making contributions to the Millennium Experience, the sum committed by each and the fee payable on each to McKinsey & Co.; and what is (a) the total committed so far and (b) the sum still to be raised. [31847]

Mr. Mandelson: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Yvette Cooper) on 24 February 1998, Official Report, column 204. There is no fee payable to McKinsey & Co. Extensive discussions are continuing with a wide range of prospective contributors and NMEC are confident that the sponsorship target will be achieved.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister without Portfolio which faiths besides Christianity will be represented in the Spirit Level of the Millennium Experience. [31877]

Mr. Mandelson: The content of the Spirit Level zone is being developed in association with the Lambeth Consultation Group. The intention is that the zone will recognise the formative influence of Christianity in our history as well as the presence of other religious traditions in our society, and will encourage visitors to explore spiritual, emotional and moral issues. Within the zone there will be areas of calm where people of all faiths and backgrounds can spend time in reflection as they wish.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister without Portfolio, pursuant to the document, Time to Make a Difference, what was the basis of the statement that Grimsby and Ghana are located on the prime meridian. [31875]

Mr. Mandelson: The document was produced by the New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) and the specific reference to Grimsby and Ghana is about a millennium project—Living on the Line—developed by Oxfam and supported by the NMEC. The project aims to link people and places along the Prime Meridian encouraging a deeper understanding between communities and bridging the differences between the developed and the developing world.

The Prime Meridian runs close to, rather than through, Grimsby; but despite this relatively minor geographical imprecision my hon. Friend will no doubt want to support Oxfam in promoting this important Living on the Line project.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister without Portfolio if he will make a statement on the product placement offered to contributors to the Millennium Experience. [32566]

Mr. Mandelson: Contributors to the Millennium Experience fall into different categories. The first four Founding Partner sponsors were announced in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Yvette Cooper), 24 February 1998, Official Report, column 204. Founding Partners have the opportunity to work with the NMEC's staff and design teams in developing the main exhibits in the Dome and, where appropriate, the Challenge programme of country-wide events and activities. These arrangements recognised the contribution of the Founding Partners to the success of the Experience and their commercial needs in terms of brand identity and promotion. The Experience is not, however, a trade show, nor an advertising hoarding for commercial products. The arrangements with the Founding Partners and other commercial contributors therefore ensure that the NMEC remains control over the integrity of the Experience as the focus of the UK's millennium celebrations.

Millennium Dome

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister without Portfolio if he will hold a national competition to name the huge figure in the Millennium Dome. [31521]

Mr. Mandelson: I have no plans to do so.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Minister without Portfolio how many contracts relating to the building of the Millennium Dome were put out to competitive tender; on what dates; by what methods; and how many responses to each were received. [32028]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 2 March 1998]: All 29 contracts relating to the building of the Millennium Dome have been put out to competitive tender by the New Millennium Experience Company. Tenders for the contracts were issued between January 1997 and January 1998. The Company received between three and seven responses for each contract.

HEALTH

Residential Care and Nursing Homes

Mr. McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many inspections of residential homes were undertaken per London borough in (a) 1994–95, (b) 1995–96, (c) 1996–97 and (d) 1997–98; and how many residential homes were visited in each borough. [31218]

Mr. Boateng: This information is not routinely collected by the Department. However, local authority social services departments in London participated in a Social Services Inspectorate national survey of registration and inspection units in 1994–95. The number of reported inspections, and the total number of local authority homes, private and voluntary (including dual registered) whether inspected or not are in the table. This survey is being repeated for 1996–97, but the results are not yet to hand. Data for the other years requested are not available.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will require registration authorities to undertake detailed company searches as a matter of routine when registering residential care and nursing homes; and if he will make a statement. [32860]

Mr. Boateng: Registration authorities are required to satisfy themselves that the person registered or applying to be registered is a "fit person" to run a home. In doing so, authorities will take into account the business background and financial viability of any applicant.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to review legislation and regulations governing the registration of residential care and nursing homes; and if he will make a statement. [32859]

Mr. Boateng: We are committed to creating effective independent regulatory arrangements for residential care homes and nursing homes which are tough, transparent and accountable. We are looking at the options for change and will set out our proposals in the White Paper on Social Services to be published in the summer.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the financial burden on local authorities of carrying out the registration and inspection of residential care and nursing homes; and if he will make a statement. [32861]

Mr. Boateng: Latest available information returned to the Department from local and health authority returns for 1995–96, indicate that the costs of local authority regulation functions were £28.6 million, and those for health authorities £9.2 million. In both cases, income from residential care and nursing home fees has fallen significantly short of the costs incurred by authorities. Regulatory fees have not been increased for several years and in January this year we published our proposals for raising fees in the "Consultation Document on Increasing Regulatory Fees for Residential Care Homes and Nursing Homes", copies of which are available in the Library.

Health Education

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has made to other Departments to improve the delivery of health education in schools, with particular reference to sexual health. [31991]

Ms Jowell: We are working in close co-operation with Ministers at the Department for Education and Employment. DfEE announced the intention to help all schools become healthy schools in the White Paper "Excellence in Schools". Our consultation paper "Our Healthier Nation" followed this up by trailing a Healthy Schools Initiative which will include establishing a National Advisory Group on Personal Social and Health Education. This will be chaired jointly by DfEE and Department of Health Ministers.

The Department and the DfEE are also collaborating on development of a programme to reduce unintended conceptions. Progress will be reviewed by a series of task groups, one of which will focus specifically on sex and relationships education.

Brook Advisory Centres

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the grant given to the Brook Advisory Centre in 1997 by his Department; and what is the planned grant for 1998 and 1999. [32644]

Ms Jowell: In 1997–98 the Brook Advisory Centre received a core grant of £80,000 from the Department of Health under the Section 64 General Scheme (Section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968). A project grant of £23,563 was also made under the same scheme.

Announcements about further core grants and project funding will be made in due course.

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Health during the period from 1980 to 1997, what were the total amounts of public funds each year granted to the Brook advisory centres by (a) his Department, (b) health authorities and (c) local authorities [32645]

1997–98	80,000

Dental Amalgam

Mrs. Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what assessment his Department has made of the findings of the EU ad hoc committee on dental amalgam; and what is its response; [32827]

(2) what representations he has received on the use of mercury in dental amalgam fillings; and if he will make a statement. [32825]

Mr. Milburn: The Department occasionally receives inquiries about the safety of dental amalgam. When the Committee on Toxicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment (COT) considered the matter in 1986 they advised that the use of dental amalgam was free from risk of systemic toxicity. COT has now reviewed the draft report which the European Commission commissioned from European Economic Area member states and we shall publish their advice shortly.

Mrs. Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice his Department issues to dentists on the contra-indications for use of mercury in dental amalgam fillings. [32826]

Mr. Milburn: In the rare instances where a patient is hypersensitive to amalgam, a general dental practitioner may seek permission from the Dental Practice Board to use an alternative filling material in the back teeth.

Influenza Immunisation

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people in the last 10 years have had serious adverse effects from the influenza inoculation. [32851]

Ms Jowell: Influenza vaccine is usually well tolerated apart from occasional soreness at the immunisation site. A total of 592 reports of serious suspected adverse drug reactions associated with influenza vaccine have been reported to the Committee on Safety of Medicines during the period 1 January 1988 to 31 December 1997 from throughout the United Kingdom. During this time over 50 million doses of influenza vaccine are estimated to have been given.

A report of a reaction does not imply causality. Many factors to be taken into account when assessing causal relationships including temporal association, any underlying disease and the possible contribution of other concomitant medication. In these circumstances it may be difficult to ascribe the cause of the reaction to a single vaccine or drug.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people in the last 10 years he estimates have received the influenza inoculation (a) on the NHS and (b) in total. [32852]

Ms Jowell: The number of doses of influenza vaccine sold in each of the last 10 years is given in the first table but it is not possible to say how many people received the vaccine. These are the total United Kingdom sales figures provided by the manufacturers. They include vaccine sold to general practitioners, health authorities, hospitals, clinics, pharmacies and private sales. These figures are not available broken down by each country.

Doses of influenza vaccine sold 1987/88 to 1997/98 (financial years), UK

	Doses of vaccine (millions)
1987/88	2.0
1989/90	3.2

The numbers of items of influenza vaccine dispensed on the National Health Service in England for 1991–1996 are given in the second table. These are the only years for which this information is available. Prescription items may not relate exactly to the number of people receiving the prescriptions, and therefore the number of doses given on the NHS.

Number of prescription items dispensed for influenza[1] vaccines, 1991 to 1996 (calendar years), England

	Number of prescription items (millions)
1991	3.6
1992	3.9

1994	4.9
1995	4.9
1996	5.0

[1] Influenza vaccines are those described within British National Formulary section 14.1, vaccines and antisera.

Note:

The data cover all prescriptions dispensed by community pharmacists and appliance contractors, dispensing doctors, and prescribing doctors for items personally administered in England.

Measles, Mumps and Rubella Vaccinations

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will assess the findings contained in the paper by Dr. Andrew Wakefield published recently in The Lancet on MMR vaccinations. [33103]

Ms Jowell: We are aware of the study by a group of researchers at the Royal Free Hospital which was published recently in The Lancet. An abstract of the work had already been reviewed by the Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation, an independent expert group which advises the United Kingdom health departments, last year. It was the view of the Committee that the study provided no scientifically convincing evidence for links between the Measles, Mumps and Rubella (MMR) vaccine, autism and inflammatory bowel disease. The more detailed report published in The Lancet has no implications for immunisation policy and practice and I would agree with the authors of the study that it "did not prove a causal association between MMR vaccine and the syndrome described".

An independent assessment of the paper was also contained in the same edition of The Lancet in the form of a commentary. The commentary highlighted the complete lack of any reliable scientific evidence for a causal link and also the weight of already published evidence against a link. The commentary reminds readers that hundreds of millions of persons worldwide have received measles containing vaccine without developing either chronic bowel or behavioural problems. MMR remains the safest way to protect children against these diseases and should continue to be used as recommended.

Continence Products

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 3 March 1998, Official Report, column 562, concerning continence products purchased by the NHS National Supplies Trust, what evidence he evaluated to support the explanation for the overall drop in value and volume. [33352]

Mr. Boateng: Data on incontinence products that are home delivered are not collected centrally. 104 National Health Service community trusts have some type of home delivery arrangements in place and further NHS trusts are considering making such arrangements. It is on this basis that it is considered likely that the drop in value and volume in continence products supplied by NHS Supplies Authority may be explained by the trend towards home delivery.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will discourage NHS trusts from selling continence products to NHS patients. [33354]

Mr. Boateng: Section 1 of the National Health Service Act 1977 requires that NHS services provided under the Act to NHS patients must be free of charge, except where the making and recovery of charges is expressly provided for by legislation. The then Chief Executive of the NHS Management Executive, Sir Duncan Nichol, wrote to health authority managers and NHS trust chief executives on 24 October 1991, to bring this matter to their attention.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 3 March, Official Report, column 563, regarding advice on continence services, what assessment he has made of the availability of the manual bowel evacuation procedure; and if training is being provided for nursing staff. [33353]

Mr. Boateng: As yet, no assessment has been made by the Department into the availability of the manual bowel evacuation procedure. The English National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting has approved post-registration training for patients with bladder and bowel continence care needs. National Health Service trusts also provide in-service training to enable practitioners to provide high quality continence care.

Public Bodies (Reports)

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the bodies within the responsibility of his Department currently required by legislation to lay a report before Parliament. [33556]

Mr. Milburn: The English National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting and the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority are required in law to provide annual reports to the Secretary of State who in turn is required in law to lay copies of the reports before Parliament.

Details of which of the public bodies sponsored by the Department produce annual reports and how they may be obtained are published annually in Public Bodies, copies of which are available in the Library.

Asthma

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to investigate the link between the extent of antibiotics use for minor illnesses and childhood asthma. [33269]

Ms Jowell: The prescribing needs of patients are a matter for the doctors responsible for their care. A number of theories have been put forward to explain the rise in prevalence of asthma in children in the past twenty to thirty years. The Department is aware of recent press reports of an as yet unpublished research study, carried out at Churchill Hospital, Oxford, which suggests that children under two years of age who are given oral antibiotics are more likely to develop asthma and other allergic conditions in later life. When the findings are published we shall certainly study them carefully.

Home Helps

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the amount charged to an individual for a home help by each local authority in England. [33322]

Mr. Milburn: Information on charges made to individuals for social service provision is not collected centrally.

CABINET OFFICE

Publications

Mr. Flight: To ask the Minister without Portfolio if he will list those European Commission (a) newsletters, (b) magazines and (c) occasional publications to which his Office subscribes. [33657]

Mr. Mandelson: My office does not subscribe to any European Commission publications.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Departmental Employees

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the number of his Department's employees by UK region, indicating the wage bill (a) in total and (b) by region in the last year for which figures are available and separately identifying the costs of London allowances and weightings. [30066]

Mr. Kilfoyle [holding answer 18 February 1998]: For the purposes of this answer, my Department includes the Prime Minister's Office, the Cabinet Office, the Office of Public Service, its executive agencies and the Central Office of Information, which is not an agency of the Cabinet Office but which reports directly to the Chancellor.

Staff figures at 1 October 1997, the latest date for which such figures are available, and the total wage bill, including costs for National Insurance contributions and superannuation payments, for 1 April 1997 to 31 January 1998, by region, were as follows:

	Staff Figures	Total Wage Bill
London	2,261	58,018,870
The South East	286	6,411,027
East Anglia	193	5,275,181
The North West	143	2,709,000

London allowances and weightings were consolidated into basic pay on 1 August 1997. Prior to this date, the costs for each of the regions were as follows:

London Allowances/Weightings (1 April to 1 July 1997)

London	1,730,815
The South East	22,971

PACE is charged with the disposal of this vacant estate which currently totals some 286 properties. Collection of the requested information for this large number of buildings will take time. I have, therefore, asked the Chief Executive of PACE to write separately to the hon. Member with this additional information. A copy of the letter will be published in the Official Report.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Fireworks

Ms Hewitt: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will publish the report of her Department's firework injury survey for 1997; and if she will make a statement. [33695]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: The number of persons injured by fireworks during the 1997 firework season was 908. This represents a fall of 26% compared with the previous year. This significant fall is I believe due to the fireworks safety Regulations introduced in October and the very effective firework safety campaign run by my Department in the run-up to Bonfire Night.

Copies of the DTI's Firework Injury Survey are being placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Fishing Industry

Ms Atherton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment her Department has made of the impact of the Multilateral Agreement on Investment on the United Kingdom fishing industry. [31844]

Mrs. Roche: Current UK policies on fishing will be unaffected by the MAI. The European Commission has notified an exception to MAI disciplines to restrict access to Community waters to vessels flying the flag of a member state or to third countries that have signed a mutual bilateral fishing agreement. In addition the UK has notified an exception to ensure that British registered vessels have a genuine economic link with this country. These measures will enable us to continue to manage sea fisheries as a sustainable resource.

Nuclear Fuel

Mr. Baker: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to her answer of 9 February 1998, Official Report, column 90, what percentage of spent fuel imported since 1990 will be reprocessed over the next (a) five years, (b) 10 years, (c) 15 years and (d) 20 years. [33016]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 6 March 1998]: The reprocessing programme for spent fuel, both imported and from the United Kingdom, is a contractual matter between BNFL and its customers. Since 1976 all new contracts for reprocessing overseas spent fuel have contained options for the return of wastes. The Government intend that such options should be exercised and that wastes arising from reprocessing be returned to the countries of origin.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assistance BNFL provided to the state authorities in Louisiana in respect of proposals to build a uranium enrichment plant in the state. [33117]

Mr. Battle: I understand from BNFL that they have provided no assistance to the Louisiana state authorities in respect of proposals to build a uranium enrichment plant in the state.

Employee Travel

Mr. Baker: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will estimate the cost of employee travel on office business, broken down into (a) fuel allowances, (b) unproductive time during travel, (c) other costs related to car transport and (d) costs related to public transport, for (i) 1994–95, (ii) 1995–96, (iii) 1996–97 and (iv) 1997–98. [32437]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths [holding answer 3 March 1998]: The authorisation of travel claims for DTI staff is devolved to local management subject to checking procedures and within allocated budgets. It does not record expenditure on fuel allowances, travel time, other costs related to car transport and costs related to public transport separately from other travel and subsistence expenses paid to staff undertaking departmental business. To provide the information requested would entail disproportionate cost. It would not be possible to measure unproductive travel time.

Arms Sales

Sir Richard Body: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to her answer of 12 December 1997, Official Report, columns 718–19, what was the total value of potential ECGD liabilities under guarantees relating to defence-related business; what was that figure as a percentage of the value of all liabilities under ECGD guarantees, in each year; and when figures for 1996–97 will be available. [32817]

Mrs. Roche: The total value of new liabilities assumed by ECGD under guarantees in respect of defence related business issued in each of the three years was as follows:

	Total value of defence business £ million	Defence as a percentage of all business
1994–95	727	21
1995–96	1,015	23
1996–97	385	15

ECGD is unable to determine retrospectively the total liabilities which matured under its guarantees in these years in respect of individual sectors such as defence related business.

The claims figures for 1996/97 have now been audited and remain as quoted in my answer to the hon. Gentleman of 12 December 1997, Official Report, column 718–19.

Correspondence

Mr. Cummings: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the Minister for Science, Energy and Industry plans to reply to the letter from the hon. Member for

Easington dated 6 January concerning a reduction in concessionary coal entitlement for retired, redundant miners and widows of miners; and if she will make a statement. [27956]

Mr. Battle: I wrote to my hon. Friend on 2 March 1998.

Millennium Compliance

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many calls have been received by the Action 2000 hotline. [32487]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 3 March 1998]: From 22 January 1998, when Action 2000 hotline was first opened, to the end of February 1998, it has received approximately 3,600 calls.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade which new books, periodicals and consultancies she has added to the lists supplied by the Millennium Bug Hotline in the last months. [32684]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 3 March 1998]: Action 2000 are responsible for the lists of books, periodicals and consultancies. I understand from them that these lists are next due to be updated at the end of March.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many inquiries can be answered at the same time for people ringing the Millennium Bug Hotline. [32685]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 3 March 1998]: I understand from Action 2000 that there are six people manning the hotline on a regular basis. Should demand require, another three are trained and can be called in at short notice. So far demand has not required more than this nine and a call queuing system is available to manage any temporary overflow.

National Minimum Wage

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to her oral statement of 16 December 1997, Official Report, column 167, concerning variations in the level of the proposed minimum wage, if she categorises the armed services as a sector. [32799]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 3 March 1998]: The National Minimum Wage Bill does not provide for variation in the level of the national minimum wage by sector of employment. The armed forces are exempt from the minimum wage by sector of employment. The armed forces are exempt from the minimum wage on the grounds set out by my hon. Friend the Minister of State which are reported in the Official Report, Standing Committee D, 5 February 1998, in particular column 777.

Environmental Technologies Exhibit

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what support her Department is making available for companies wishing to exhibit at the ET'98 convention on environmental technologies at the NEC Birmingham in June. [33114]

Mr. Battle: The Department will support ET'98 by participating in the exhibition as it has done each year since 1990. In addition, the Department is widely publicising the event so as to encourage overseas buyers in particular to attend the exhibition.

Departmental Employees (Japan)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many (a) full time or (b) part time (i) employees and (ii) consultants her Department funds in Japan broken down by organisation; and how many of these work from offices in the British Embassy in Tokyo. [32980]

Mr. Ian McCartney: One of my officials is currently on secondment on the Japanese Ministry of International Trade and Industry (MITI) and this posting is being fully funded by my Department. There are no other DTI employees or full or part time consultants in Japan funded by my Department. Occasionally the Embassy will employ consultants at our cost to provide specific services in support of our inward investment, commercial and science and technology activities in Japan. Neither our secondee to MITI nor any hired consultants work from the offices of the British Embassy in Tokyo.

Invest in Britain Bureau

Mr. Wigley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the expected out-turn expenditure by her Department in supporting the work of the Invest in Britain Bureau in the current financial year; and what were the corresponding sums spent in each of the past five years. [32979]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Department's Invest in Britain Bureau's forecast expenditure outturn on programme costs for 1997–98 is £13.7 million, consisting of £3.3 million for promotional activities and £10.4 million support for the English Regional Development Organisations. The forecast outturn on running costs for 1997–98 for IBB is £2.4 million. Corresponding figures for the previous five years are shown in the table.

Invest in Britain Bureau expenditure

1993–94	2.8	5.8	1.7

ASEM II Meeting

Mr. Mullin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what account she will take of human rights issues during her preparation for the Business Event which she is hosting at the ASEM II meeting in April; and if she will make a statement. [31022]

Mrs. Beckett: The 1998 Asia Europe Business Forum is primarily a mechanism to promote business to business contacts between ASEM member countries. The agenda for the ASEM Summit is still under discussion. It is expected to be wide-ranging and productive and to touch upon human rights issues.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she plans to consult with relevant non-government organisations in preparation for the Business Event she is hosting at the ASEM II meeting in April. [31021]

Mrs. Beckett: The 1998 Asia Europe Business Forum is primarily a mechanism to promote business to business contacts between ASEM member countries. Its agenda has been drawn up in consultation with our ASEM partners. I currently have no plans to consult with non-government organisations.

Exports (Kenya)

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many licence applications are pending for the export of tear gas and plastic bullets to Kenya. [24332]

Mrs. Roche: These goods, and others, are controlled under entries in Part 1 of Schedule III to the Export of Goods (Control) Order which are known as the ratings for these goods: tear gas under entry ML7; and plastic bullets under entries ML3 or PL5021.

The Export Control Organisation's computer databases have been interrogated, and the following results were obtained. At 12 January 1998, decisions had not yet been taken on 4 applications for open individual licences to export goods rated ML3 to Kenya. The paper records of these 4 applications have been examined and none covered tear gas or plastic bullets. There are no other pending applications for Standard Individual Export Licences or Open Individual Export Licences for the export to Kenya of goods with any of the specified ratings.

This information should be considered in light of my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), Official Report, 30 October 1997, columns 870–871.

SCOTLAND

Lynebank Hospital

Ms Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the cost of maintaining long-stay hospital facilities at Lynebank for 40 elderly patients and 40 patients with forensic and dual diagnosis for severe learning and physical disabilities. [29152]

Mr. Galbraith [holding answer 23 February 1998]: Fife Health Board and Fife Healthcare NHS Trust are undertaking further work to identify the preferred option for the future provision of NHS continuing care services currently provided at Lynebank Hospital for learning disabled and elderly patients.

The Trust has estimated the theoretical cost of providing for 40 frail elderly patients and approximately 48 learning disability patients on the Lynebank site as below:

	£ million
Two frail elderly wards (40 places)	1.0
Four learning disabilities wards (approximately 48 places) plus Community Learning Disability Team	3.7
Total	4.7

While the Trust has identified clinical costs, facilities costs have been pro-rated and may not be operationally achievable. The estimates also exclude central services costs, interest and depreciation. The figure of £3.7 million for learning disabilities is based on the cost of operating 4 wards (48 places). The provision of 40 learning disability places rather than 48 is unlikely to make a material difference to the estimate.

Recycled Land

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage and surface area of recycled land has been decontaminated in each of the last 12 years by county and region in Scotland; and what percentage and surface area of that land has been used for housing developments. [32426]

Mr. Macdonald: Information specifically on decontaminated land which has subsequently been used for housing developments is not available centrally. However, the Scottish Vacant and Derelict Land Survey does provide some information on the amount of vacant and derelict land being taken up for a range of uses. The information related to housing is as follows:

Vacant and derelict land recycled for housing development

	Hectares	Percentage

Regional Selective Assistance

Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many grants of regional selective assistance were made in Scotland in 1997; how many were made at the maximum level; what was the average level; and how many jobs he estimates were created. [32552]

Mr. Wilson: During 1997 there were 235 offers of Regional Selective Assistance (RSA) made in Scotland. Offers to 3 projects in development areas were made at the GB maximum RSA cost per job limit and there were no offers made to intermediate area projects at the lower cost per job limit applying to these areas. The weighted average RSA cost per job of all 1997 offers in development areas was £8,103 and in intermediate areas was £3,679. These offers were in total associated with the planned creation of 19,546 new jobs and safeguarding of 3,116 jobs. The actual number of jobs created and safeguarded cannot be ascertained until the projects in question have been completed, which on average takes some 3 to 4 years.

Industrial and Business Investors

Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what grants other than regional selective assistance were made available to industrial and business investors in Scotland in 1997. [32553]

Mr. Wilson: In addition to assistance available throughout the United Kingdom, The Scottish Office, Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise make a number of grants available for business development in Scotland. The table shows the grants available and the level of expenditure in 1996–1997, the last complete financial year.

Mrs. McKenna: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish, for each of the last 10 years, the number of verdicts handed down by Scottish courts of (a) guilty, (b) not guilty and (c) not proven. [32802]

Mr. McLeish: The table provides the available information for 1986–1995, the latest ten years for which information is available.

Social Housing

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will reduce the number of units or hectares in a housing development above which local authorities can require an element of social housing to be provided in the development. [32337]

Mr. Macdonald: [holding answer 3 March 1998]: Current guidance in Scotland does not specify a particular scale of housing development above which local authorities can require houses to be provided which are affordable to those in lower income groups. Instead, local authorities are encouraged to consider, in conjunction with Scottish Homes, whether there is a requirement for affordable housing to meet local needs in a particular area. Where appropriate, in the light of that consideration, structure and local plans should then include policies which address any such needs so identified.

Public Appointments

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many of the appointments to public bodies which he has made since 1 May 1997 have been from the Public Appointments Unit list. [33246]

Mr. Dewar: The Scottish Office maintains its own Public Appointments List and therefore makes limited use of names from the Public Appointments Unit. From time to time the Public Appointments Unit passes names to the Scottish Office for the Public Appointments List, and vice versa. The Scottish Office List is used as one of a number of sources, including advertising, to ensure the widest possible range of suitably qualified candidates for the public appointments which I make. The specific sources of the names of those appointed are not recorded centrally.

Council Tax

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the council tax at Band D in each council area for each year from 1991–92 to 1997–98, adding together the totals for district and region where appropriate and giving the figures for the water and sewage council tax or charge separately. [33137]

Mr. Macdonald [holding answer 6 March 1998]: As the information is rather lengthy, I will write to the hon. Member and place copies in the Library of the House.

Public Housing

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many houses were built by (a) local authorities and (b) housing associations in each of the last five years. [33212]

Mr. Macdonald: The available information, which covers the years 1992–96, is set out in the table.

New housebuilding completions[1] by local authorities[2] and housing associations in Scotland between 1992 and 1996

Year	Local authority	Housing association
1992	697	3,044
1993	502	2,723
1994	548	2,990
1995	499	5,003
1996	209	2,683

[1] Information on new housebuilding is collected centrally and published in a quarterly bulletin, the latest being 'Housing Trends in Scotland: Quarter Ended 31 March 1997' (HSG/1997/7) in November 1997.
[2] The figures for local authority new housebuilding from 1994 may not be complete since not all local authorities have submitted returns.

Council Expenditure

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the additional responsibilities and statutory obligations placed on Scottish councils which involved expenditure by councils in each year from 1991–92 to 1997–98; what estimate the Scottish Office has made of the additional (a) annual cost and (b) one-off cost each of these involved for Scottish councils; and what additional amounts were provided by the Scottish Office to councils through aggregate external finance specifically to meet these costs. [33222]

Mr. Macdonald [holding answer 6 March 1998]: The statutory new burdens and transfers of responsibility recognised in the local government finance settlements each year from 1991–92 to 1997–98 are set out in the table below:

Scottish Parliament

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on what date his Department started looking for a temporary site for the Scottish Parliament; on what date the Strathclyde Region complex was first considered; and on what date it was decided to add it to the short list of sites. [33153]

Mr. Dewar [holding answer 6 March 1998]: I announced on 17 October last year my intention to ensure that, if necessary, the Scottish Parliament had available to it adequate interim accommodation. My officials began to gather information on potential interim locations later that month. The Glasgow option was first considered in detail in mid-February this year, after it became clear that there were difficulties in identifying suitable office accommodation for the Parliament's use in Edinburgh. I decided to add the Glasgow option to the short list on 27 February 1998.

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which sites were assessed as possible temporary homes for the Scottish Parliament. [33154]

Mr. Dewar [holding answer 6 March 1998]: A large number of potential interim locations were considered, and of these a smaller number were assessed in detail. These comprised, in Edinburgh, the Assembly Hall of the Church of Scotland, the McEwan Hall, the Old Royal High School, the Royal College of Physicians, and St. James' House; in Glasgow, the former Strathclyde Regional Council Chamber; and in Hamilton, the South Lanarkshire Council Chambers. A wide range of office accommodation to support Parliamentary activity was also considered.

English Grand Committee

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what briefing on the establishment of an English Grand Committee of the House was circulated to the Press before the debate on Amendment 258 to the Scotland Bill; and if he will place a copy of the briefing in the Library. [33546]

Mr. McLeish: I briefed the Parliamentary lobby correspondents on Tuesday 3 March on the background to the 6th day of the Commons Committee Stage of the Scotland Bill. As part of the briefing I made available a lobby note to help the correspondents to understand the part of the Bill due to be debated and the issues which might be raised in the debate. The note, as usual, is not an official Government document and was not intended for publication or reproduction. I am however placing a copy of the briefing in the Library.

Rural Schools

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to introduce measures similar to those proposed in England to protect rural schools from closure; and if he will make a statement. [33300]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 6 March 1998]: There are significant differences between Scotland and England in the arrangements for deciding on school closures. The position of rural schools in Scotland is already recognised in the long-standing statutory requirement for education authorities to submit for my right hon. Friend's consent any proposal to close a school where the distance between it and the alternative school is 8.046720 or more kilometres (5 miles) in the case of a primary school or 16.093440 or more kilometres (10 miles) in the case of a secondary school. My right hon. Friend gives careful consideration to such proposals taking into particular account the educational basis on which they are made and the wider impact on the community served by the school in question.

Schools

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) primary and (b) secondary state schools there are in each council area in Scotland; and how many new schools were (i) opened and (ii) closed or merged in each area in each year from 1986–87 to 1997–98. [33138]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 6 March 1998]: Information on the number of primary and secondary schools is given in the table, from 1987–88. The table, which is derived from the annual schools census, gives some indication of changes in school numbers over the years involved. However, it is not a reliable indication of the actual numbers of new schools or schools which have closed or merged. Information on those is not collected centrally.

Civil Servants

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate for each of the last five years, the number and percentage of new civil servants in his Department who attended Oxford or Cambridge University, broken down into the number of entrants joining the Department from (a) the regular Civil Service entrance procedure, (b) the fast stream and (c) the private sector. [33085]

Mr. Dewar: This information is not available from the computerised personnel records.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the number of civil servants in his Department, at each grade, who received their schooling in the independent school sector. [33084]

Mr. Dewar: This information is not available.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the number and percentage of civil servants in his Department, at each grade including and above higher executive officer who (a) attended university and (b) attended either Oxford or Cambridge University. [33083]

Mr. Dewar: The main computerised personnel system records details of qualifications gained rather than establishment attended. Coverage of academic qualifications is not currently comprehensive, and so reliable information is not available. An exercise to verify the information held on this system and to collect incomplete details is scheduled for later in the year.

The Scottish Prison Service and Historic Scotland maintain their own personnel records. The information sought is not currently available from these systems.

Nursery Education

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the proportion of nursery education places financed by the voucher scheme and provided by (i) local authorities, (ii) the private sector and (iii) the voluntary sector in each education authority area in Scotland in 1997–98. [31714]

Mr. Wilson: Approaching 90 per cent. of the identified eligible children have redeemed vouchers. The proportion of redemptions in each sector is set out in the table for each local authority area.

Notes:

1. Information shown as a percentage share of redemption as some children access more than one centre and sector.
2. Includes LA nursery schools and classes, LA day nurseries, grant aided special schools and self governing schools.
3. Includes private nurseries, independent schools and childminders.
4. Individual centres identified themselves as belonging to this sector.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he plans to take to maintain the current proportion of nursery places provided by private and voluntary groups after the voucher system ends. [31715]

Mr. Wilson: As I have already made clear in the consultation paper "Education in Early Childhood: the Pre-School Years", I expect local authorities to consider carefully the opportunities for working in partnership with voluntary and private pre-school centres in their areas; and to commission places from centres accredited by HM Inspectors of Schools wherever this makes a cost-effective contribution to supply.

Authorities will be invited to say how they wish the total grant for their area split between provision at their own hand and places they intend to purchase in the private and voluntary sectors. In making these proposals authorities will wish to take into account that some 14,000 children are at present accessing education places provided by private and voluntary centres across Scotland. I also expect them to consider carefully the needs and preferences of parents, including those in, or seeking, employment.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what criteria he will use to determine whether a local authority has entered into an effective partnership with the private and voluntary sectors to provide nursery places for financial year 1998–99. [31716]

Mr. Wilson: The consultation paper "Education in Early Childhood: The Pre-School Years" encouraged local authorities to consider the scope for collaborating with the voluntary and private sectors to expand provision for pre-school children. It invited comments on the kinds of partnership which might be most effective and how authorities might draw on relevant experience in this area. Responses to the consultation are now being analysed. I intend to review in the autumn authorities' progress in developing partnerships of all kinds.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what will be the criteria for allocating central grant for nursery education in fiscal year 1998–99. [31718]

Mr. Wilson: I am currently considering responses to the funding issues raised in the consultation paper "Education in Early Childhood: The Pre-School Years" and I expect to make an announcement later this month on how resources are to be distributed.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Civil Servants

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if she will estimate the number of civil servants in her Department, at each grade, who received their schooling in the independent school sector; [33072]

(2) if she will estimate the number and percentage of civil servants in her Department, at each grade including and above higher executive officer who (a) attended university and (b) attended either Oxford or Cambridge University; [33071]

(3) if she will estimate for each of the last five years, the number and percentage of new civil servants in her Department who attended Oxford or Cambridge University, broken down into the number of entrants joining the Department from (a) the regular Civil Service entrance procedure, (b) the fast stream and (c) the private sector. [33073]

Mr. Field: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Pensions

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans she has to alter the minimum funding requirement on pension schemes so as to take into account the lower forecast net dividend yield. [32975]

Mr. Denham: The detailed requirements for minimum funding requirement (MFR) valuations are set out in regulations and in an actuarial guidance note produced by the Faculty and Institute of Actuaries and approved by the Secretary of State. The Faculty and Institute have set up working groups to look at the effects of the July Budget changes on a number of issues, including the MFR, and officials are in close contact with the profession. Although the Faculty and Institute have made recommendations for changes to the valuation method following the Budget changes, they have now indicated that they wish to do further work on the operation of the MFR generally before revising their guidance note. Any changes must await their further recommendations.

Correspondence

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when she expects to reply to the letter of 16 December 1997, from the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire on behalf of Mr. Moore. [33356]

Mr. Denham: A reply was sent on Tuesday 3 March.

Treasury Grant

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, (1) pursuant to her answer of 26 February 1998, Official Report, column 345, on Treasury grant to the National Insurance Fund, for what reason the full amounts of the Treasury grants will not be needed in (a) 1997–98 and (b) 1998–99; [33268]

(2) what were the total sums (a) allocated and (b) spent on the Treasury Supplement and the Treasury Grant in each of the past 20 years. [33267]

Mr. Denham: Information on the amounts of Treasury Supplement and Treasury Grant is set out in the table.

[1] The Treasury Supplement was abolished in 1988–89; the Treasury Grant was introduced from 1993–94.

[2] Maximum amount of Treasury Grant made available for 1993–94 under section 2(1) of the Social Security Act 1993.

[3] Maximum amounts of Treasury Grant available for those years as prescribed by Orders made under section 2(2) of the Social Security Act 1993. The amounts were based on estimates of benefit expenditure from the National Insurance Fund in those years contained in the Government Actuary's reports on the draft Social Security Benefits Up-rating Orders and draft Social Security (Contributions) (Re-rating and National Insurance Fund Payments) Orders for those years.

[4] Amounts of Treasury Grant Voted in Supply Estimates and paid into the National Insurance Fund.

Until the Treasury Supplement was abolished in 1988–89, it was calculated and paid into the National Insurance Fund as a fixed percentage of the Fund's expected annual income from National Insurance contributions. The Treasury Grant was introduced from 1993–94 as a more flexible means of enabling adjustments to be made to the level at which the Fund stands so that, after meeting its expenditure commitments on benefits and other payments, the Fund has a reasonable working balance at the end of each financial year. The advice of the Government Actuary is that the planned level of this balance should not be less than one-sixth (16.7 per cent.) of the Fund's annual benefit expenditure.

The amounts of Treasury Grant Voted in the main Supply Estimates and paid into the Fund each year are those estimated by the Government Actuary in his report on the drafts of the annual Social Security benefits up-rating and Contributions (re-rating and National Insurance Fund payments) Orders. But the maximum level of Grant which can be made available to the Fund each year is prudently prescribed, by Order, at a higher amount. The maximum Grant is set so that, if in that year the Fund's income from contributions is lower than expected or its expenditure on benefits is higher than forecast, additional amounts of Grant may be paid into the Fund subject to Parliament approving the necessary Supplementary Estimate. This might arise when, for example, the level of unemployment is markedly higher than expected.

In line with estimates made by the Government Actuary in January 1997[1], the total amount of Treasury Grant Voted and paid into the National Insurance Fund for 1997–98 is £940 million. The maximum level of Grant available for 1997–98 is £1,713 million[2]. The Government Actuary's latest estimates[3] indicate that the balance in the Fund at 31 March 1998 will be equivalent to 19.2 per cent. of annual benefit expenditure; hence there is no need for any further Grant to be paid into the Fund in 1997–98. These estimates also indicate that without any Grant in 1998–99, the balance in the Fund at 31 March 1999 is likely be equivalent to 17.4 per cent. of annual benefit expenditure. Nevertheless, we have prudently prescribed[4] that a Grant of up to 2 per cent. of annual benefit expenditure (£896 million) can, if necessary, be made available to the Fund in 1998–99.

Disability Benefits

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans she has to consult disability organisations before identifying specific proposals for disability benefits as part of her Department's comprehensive spending review. [33499]

Mr. Denham: We have given a clear commitment that we will not make any changes without consulting disabled people, and groups who represent and support them, on how we can ensure that the welfare state delivers independence and social inclusion, not discrimination and exclusion. We have already met on a number of occasions with disability interest groups and we continue to welcome their views on how the systems can be improved.

Lone Parents

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much it would cost to exempt lone parents with children under five years old from the provisions laid down in Clause 70 of the Social Security Bill. [26169]

Mr. Keith Bradley: Existing recipients will continue to retain entitlement to the lone parent element of Child Benefit. The estimated additional cost of exempting lone parents with children under five years old from the provisions laid down in Clause 70 of the Social Security Bill is £22 million over the next three years. The cost of exempting those lone parents from the parallel measure to remove entitlement to the lone parent rates of family premium would be £225 million over the same period.

Benefits

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will estimate the effect on the total Social Security budget in (a) 2000–01 and (b) 2001–02 of making benefits available only to those aged (i) 0 to 16 years, and to 21 years for those in further or higher education, and (ii) over 60 years. [24441]

Mr. Denham: The information requested can be provided only at disproportionate costs.

The closest readily available figures are for departmental expenditure by type of benefit.

The impact of paying only pensioner and family benefits on departmental expenditure

	1998–99	1999–2000
Total benefit expenditure (A)	99,190	102,930
Expenditure on families and pensioners (B)	63,450	65,720
Estimated effect (A)-(B)	35,740	37.210

Notes:

1. Figures are not available after 1999–2000.
2. Figures have been rounded to the nearest 10 million pounds.
3. Expenditure on non income-related benefits has been classified by reason for payment of benefit rather than the group to whom the benefit is paid. For example, disability benefits which are paid to pensioners are treated as disability benefits and are therefore included in the estimated savings.
4. Income-Related benefit expenditure has been classified by the group to whom the benefit is paid. For example, Income Support expenditure on pensioners will not be included as part of the savings, whereas IS expenditure on the non pensioner disabled will.
5. Income Support and Social fund expenditure in the family category represents Lone Parents and therefore excludes spending on two parent families. The two parent family expenditure for these benefits are therefore included as part of the savings. Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit expenditure in the family category includes some spending on other groups which is not readily identified.

Benefit Integrity Project

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to her answer of 23 February 1998, Official Report, columns 124–25, concerning the sampling of Adjudication Officer decisions in respect of disability living allowance, what special arrangements have been made to check decisions under the Benefit Integrity Project; and what proportion of the sample of disability living allowance decisions have resulted in (a) overpayment and (b) underpayment of benefit in each of the last three years. [31884]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 2 March 1998]: The Benefit Integrity Project is designed to ensure correct payments of Disability Living Allowance (DLA). While it is right to ensure that people who are in receipt of benefit are entitled, we are determined that those checks should be undertaken as sensitively as possible, and that where a check indicates a change in entitlement, that we should get it right. The new safeguard introduced from 9 February, which ensures that no decision to remove or reduce entitlement made as part of the Project will be based solely on the claimant's evidence, will help ensure we get the decisions right and restore confidence.

The administration of this programme is a matter for Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with further details.

Letter from David Riggs to Mr. Paul Burstow, dated 9 March 1998:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked Peter Mathison to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking pursuant to her Answer of 24th February concerning the sampling of Adjudication Officer's decisions in respect of Disability Living Allowance (DLA), what special arrangements have been made to check decisions under the Benefits Integrity Project (BIP); and what proportion of the sample of DLA decisions have resulted in (a) overpayment and (b) underpayment of benefit in each of the last three years. As Mr Mathison is away from the office on leave, I am replying.

The BIP operates according to the normal DLA adjudication rules. Therefore, BIP cases are subject to the same checking procedures applied to all other DLA cases. As part of an ongoing process designed to maintain adjudication standards, a statistically valid sample of all Adjudication Officer decisions is checked by the Adjudication Checking and Advice Team (ACAT), who report their findings to Benefit Agency managers and the Chief Adjudication Officer. In the same way, this team checks a statistically valid sample of BIP cases, which are kept separate for project evaluation purposes.

The information relating to overpayments and underpayments is not available in the format requested. Data for all DLA/Attendance Allowance cases is only available from April 1996. These are as shown:

	Total	Overpayments	Underpayments
96/97	7145	198	323
97/98 to 28/2/98	5241	215	214
97/98(BIP)	355	17	23

Note:

Data is provisional and subject to change.

As part of the quality control mechanism, decisions relating to both overpayments and underpayments are taken into account and reported to Managers. Any trends identified are highlighted to the relevant Manager for consideration of any action which may be necessary.

ACAT report on a monthly basis, an analysis of all the reports will be prepared with a view to identifying and recommending any areas for improvement.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) on what date the Benefit Integrity Project came into operation; [33500]

(2) pursuant to the oral statement of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), of 4 March 1998, Official Report, column 686, what changes have been made to the design of the Benefit Integrity Project since 1 May. [33501]

Mr. Denham: The Benefit Integrity Project was implemented on 28 April 1997, when the first postal inquiry cases were selected and previewed. The first questionnaires were issued on 6 May 1997.

Measures taken since 1 May include:

introducing regular meetings with representatives from organisations of, and for, disabled people to discuss their concerns about the Project and to share information as the work progresses; agreeing that certain groups of DLA recipients would not be contacted directly as part of the Project. Namely people paid under DLA Special Rules, double amputees, paraplegics, quadriplegics, people who are blind and deaf and those within our definition of severe mental impairment; inviting and acted upon suggestions for improving the letters that would be used to arrange visits;

delaying the home visiting programme, due to start in July, until August to enable a session on disability awareness to be included in the training programme for all visiting staff; opening communication channels, for example, emerging findings from the operation of the Project were discussed at a meeting with a wide ranging group of organisations of, and for, disabled people in mid-November and an information pack was subsequently issued for their use in newsletters and other publications.

On 9 February 1998, we introduced an additional safeguard to improve confidence in decision making and to reassure disabled people. From that date, no decision made as part of the Project to reduce or remove someone's benefit will be made on the basis of the claimant's statement alone—there will always be additional evidence to support the decision.

Benefit Claimants (Interim Support)

Mrs. Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what provision her Department makes to help those entering work in the period between benefits payments ending and the first wage payment being received. [29161]

Mr. Keith Bradley: We believe that work is the best form of welfare for people of working age. We want to make it worthwhile for people to make the transition into work and ensure a fair return on extra earnings once they are in work. Research has shown that unemployed people are particularly concerned about possible income gaps between cessation of out-of-work benefits and the point at which first wages are received.

The benefit system provides some help towards overcoming this barrier to leaving benefit for work.

People who have been unemployed for six months or more may be eligible for the four week Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit extended payment scheme which will cover their rent or Council Tax for the first few weeks of work, by which time any in-work Housing Benefit or Council Tax Benefit they may be entitled to should be ready to begin.

Procedures are in place to enable the payment of other in-work benefits, such as Family Credit, to be made more quickly. The vast majority of claims for Family Credit from the newly employed are cleared within five working days.

People who have had part-time earnings or child maintenance taken into account in their Income Support or Jobseeker's Allowance can receive Back-to-Work or Child Maintenance Bonuses when they leave benefit for work. These provide tax-free lump sums at the point of transition from benefit to work and can help to bridge any income gaps.

In exceptional circumstances a Crisis Loan from the discretionary Social Fund can be awarded to help with living expenses in an emergency or as a consequence of a disaster. The Crisis Loan must be the only means of preventing serious risk or damage to the health or safety of the applicant, or a member of their family.

We intend to modernise the Welfare State so that it provides employment opportunity for all, rather than discouraging work and trapping people in poverty. With the help of the Taylor task force we are looking at options to reform the tax and benefit systems, so that they promote work incentives, help remove obstacles to returning to work, reduce poverty and welfare dependency and strengthen community and family life.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Stretch Limousines

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the safety of stretch limousines without seat belts for the middle seats; and how many accidents have been recorded involving such vehicles in the last three years. [32872]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Department has not made any specific safety assessment regarding any model of limousine. The accident information requested, which covers all limousines, is shown in the table.

Winchester to Southampton Bypass

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received on the planning application relating to the former Winchester to Southampton bypass; and if he will personally review the planning application. [33120]

Mr. Raynsford: The Inspector who conducted the public local inquiry into the called in planning applications for an extension to the park and ride scheme at Bar End, Winchester, has now submitted his report to the Secretary of State. Representations were made at the inquiry by Hampshire County Council and others. The Secretary of State received some 145 letters about the proposals and these were submitted to the Inquiry. The Secretary of State is considering the Inspector's report and will announce his decision as soon as possible.

Housing Standards

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what guidance he has given to (a) local authorities and (b) other housing organisations concerning minimum standards for the (i) construction and (ii) renovation and (iii) size of rooms of dwellings. [33133]

Mr. Raynsford: The Building Regulations apply to the construction of new buildings, including dwellings, and require that they provide reasonable standards of health and safety for the occupants, and also include reasonable provision for the conservation of fuel and power. Guidance on ways of meeting the requirements of the Regulations is given in the Approved Documents which support the Regulations.

Guidance on the current Housing Fitness Standard and home renovation grants is given in Circular 17/96, although major renovation work could also be subject to the Building Regulations. We are currently reviewing the Housing Fitness Standard and, on 10 February 1998, a consultation document was issued which invited comments on proposals and options for change. Copies of this consultation are in the Libraries of each House.

The Government do not issue guidance on room sizes. However in Housing Associations' dwellings, the Housing Corporation requires that rooms are large enough to accommodate appropriate furniture and normal activities.

Pavement Obstructions

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to ensure a consistent approach by local authorities towards the removal of obstructions from pavements with particular reference to goods for sale. [33102]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Anything placed on the highway is capable of being deemed an obstruction that the highway authority is under a duty to have removed. The highway includes the pavement. Whether an offence is actually committed in a given case is, however, a matter to be proved. Case law has established that there must be proof that placing the thing in question on the highway is unreasonable. This depends on the circumstances of the particular case. The Government have concluded that these can vary to such a degree that it is not possible to offer meaningful detailed advice to local highway authorities on the exercise of their powers, but encourage them to follow policies that place emphasis on the need to maintain unobstructed passage along the pavement for passers-by, but also take account of the interests of shoppers and retailers.

Hazardous Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Fourth Meeting of the Parties to the Basel Convention on transfrontier movement of hazardous waste, held in Malaysia in February. [33111]

Angela Eagle: The Conference was held in Kuching, Malaysia from 23–27 February. I attended the High Level segment from 26–27 February representing the Presidency of the European Union. This was a successful conference both for the UK and for the European Union.

The Conference adopted an amendment to the Convention based on a joint proposal by Chile and the European Community which added new annexes listing hazardous and non-hazardous waste. The UK has been closely associated with the development of this proposal from its inception and was particularly active, as a member of the Troika, in support of the Luxembourg Presidency's negotiations with Chile to merge their proposal with the Community's. The new amendment will give legal clarity to the scope of the earlier 'ban' amendment (Decision III/1) adopted by the Third Conference of Parties. The latter will ban exports of hazardous waste from Annexe VII Parties (OECD countries, the EC and Liechtenstein) to non-Annexe VII countries. The Chile/EC amendment should therefore add considerably to the prospects for securing enough ratifications to bring the ban amendment into force. It will not require ratification, but will enter into force within six months except for any Party notifying the United Nations that it does not accept the amendment.

Proposals from Israel, Monaco and Slovenia to be added to Annexe VII were unsuccessful. Instead, the Parties decided that Annexe VII should not be amended until the ban amendment has entered into force. To date, nine Parties have ratified of the 65 required. The UK ratified on 13 October 1997. The conference also decided that an analysis should be prepared highlighting the issues related to Annexe VII.

The Conference extended the mandate of the legal group which is charged with developing a Protocol on liability and compensation for damage arising from transboundary movements of hazardous waste. The group was, however, instructed to consider the implications of the ban amendment and other relevant international conventions for the proposed Protocol.

The Conference adopted a number of other decisions including one aimed at enhancing the capability of Parties to detect and enforce against illegal traffic and others concerned with capacity building in developing countries. The UK has recently agreed to fund two such projects forming part of an Action programme for the Caribbean.

Genetically Modified Organisms

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list those establishments which have received a licence to carry out investigations into genetically modified organisms. [33217]

Angela Eagle: The Genetically Modified Organisms (Contained Use) Regulations 1992, as amended in 1996, control all activities involving the contained use of genetically modified organisms (GMOs). The Regulations require that all premises where such activities are to be undertaken must be notified to the Health and Safety Executive (HSE). For higher risk activities work cannot proceed until HSE has issued a consent. Low risk activities may proceed unless HSE objects.

I have arranged for a list of the establishments where contained use of GMOs is undertaken to be placed in the Library.

Jubilee Line

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the sources of (a) borrowed funds and (b) capital funds for the extension of the Jubilee Line; what sums relate to agreements with private developers entered into as part of the initial construction agreements; and what parts of such borrowing (i) count and (ii) do not count against the borrowing ceilings for public fund investment required in respect of the convergence criteria for entering the third stage of Economic and Monetary Union. [33236]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Some £2 billion of the total cost of the Jubilee Line Extension is being directly funded by ring-fenced Government grant, of which over £400 million is being provided by private sector contributions. In excess of £100 million of the private sector contributions has already been received; the balance will be paid in stages over a 25 year period. Remaining costs will be met from London Transport's core resources (which include substantial Government grant).

The general government financial deficit (GGFD) used under the Maastricht Treaty's excessive deficits procedure includes central Government grants to public corporations. It does not include borrowing undertaken by public corporations, which are outside of general government. However, as noted above, the JLE is not being financed by any such borrowing.

Rail Freight

Sir Raymond Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has had with Rail Property Ltd in respect of land within its ownership which could be used for future rail freight terminals. [33696]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State discussed property in British Rail (BR) ownership with the Chairman of the BR Board soon after taking office. Officials discuss with Rail Property Ltd. (RPL) any such sites which are brought to their attention as having possible future rail freight use. RPL informs Railtrack and industry members of such sites available for sale.

Concessionary Fares

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has for a national concessionary public transport fare scheme for the elderly and disabled; and if he will make a statement. [33866]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Concessionary fares are being considered as part of the review of integrated transport policy.

Vehicle Excise Duty

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what sums have been collected in vehicle excise duty in respect of heavy goods vehicles in Northern Ireland in each of the last three years for which figures are readily available. [33140]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The information is as follows:

1994–95	21,263
1995–96	20,506
1996–97	19,261

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact on vehicle registrations in the United Kingdom of the different rates of vehicle excise duty applying in respect of commercial vehicles between the United Kingdom and the Irish Republic. [33139]

Ms Glenda Jackson: None.

Light Dues

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on light dues. [34005]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I am pleased to announce that there will be no changes to the light dues rates for 1998–99. Current rates were set in 1997, when charges were reduced by an average of 4.6%, following four years of stability. Rates are now below 1992 levels in cash terms. The ability to maintain light dues at current levels is an indication of the General Lighthouse Authorities' continuing efforts to achieve greater efficiency.

I am also announcing a minor amendment to the Light Dues Regulations which provides an exemption for vessels engaged solely in harbour maintenance or dredging, on behalf of a statutory or harbour authority.

EC Eco-Management and Audit Scheme

Mr. Leslie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what his plans are regarding the future administration of the EC Eco-Management and Audit Scheme. [34126]

Mr. Meacher: I have decided that from 1 May this year, the Institute of Environmental Assessment will take over this function from my Department, which has administered EMAS in the United Kingdom since it came into operation in April 1995. The Institute will be the official Competent Body responsible for registering sites under the scheme on a fee charging basis in England, Wales and Northern Ireland. A separate announcement will be made later about Scotland.

When my Department was designated as the Competent Body in 1994, the declared intention was to keep the arrangements simple by limiting the number of key players involved, particularly in the initial stages of setting up EMAS. EMAS has now moved beyond this developmental stage, with nearly 50 registered sites in the United Kingdom. Its effectiveness in helping industry to manage its impacts on the environment and publicise its results is becoming increasingly recognised, alongside ISO 14001, the international environmental management systems standard, which has been achieved by over 430 companies in the United Kingdom—more than anywhere else in Europe—and which can be used by any organisation, either as the environmental management system for EMAS or on its own.

My decision therefore reflects the importance which the Government attach to motivating businesses to adopt externally verified environmental management systems. The Environment Agency is firmly committed to encouraging the use of such systems because of their value in improving the environment, and I welcome its work in this respect. I will be looking to all leading companies to respond by committing themselves to EMAS and ISO 14001.

TREASURY

Political Advisers (Support Staff)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many secretarial and support staff work full-time in support of his political advisers. [25189]

Mr. Gordon Brown [holding answer 23 January 1998]: Two.

Arts Donations

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to change the arrangements for personal taxation to encourage donations to the arts. [30514]

Dawn Primarolo: Many donations to arts bodies already qualify for tax relief because the recipient is a charity. The question of any changes is a matter for the Chancellor as part of his Budget.

Mr. C. Whelan

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if Mr. C. Whelan is fulfilling duties formerly fulfilled by a career civil servant. [28925]

Mr. Gordon Brown [holding answer 10 February 1998]: The terms under which Special Advisers work are set out in the schedule to their contract, a model copy of which is available in the Library. These build upon rules in force under previous Administrations.

No. 11 Downing Street

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the cost of the refurbishment of the wooden floor in the state room at No. 11 Downing Street. [30970]

Mr. Gordon Brown [holding answer 23 February 1998]: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given to the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 26 January 1998, Official Report, column 66.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many employers would be required to pay more in working family tax credit than in income tax withheld through PAYE if the proposed working families tax credit was paid at the same level as family credit. [31328]

Dawn Primarolo: If the Chancellor announces, in his Budget Statement, the introduction of a WFTC then the number of employers who will be required to pay more in working families tax credit than in income tax withheld through PAYE will depend on the precise design of the credit and its administrative rules.

Millennium Compliance

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many officials or individuals working within his Department on millennium compliance have (a) given notice of their intention to leave and (b) left his Department in the last six months. [32620]

Mrs. Liddell: One official working on millennium compliance has given notice and left the Treasury in the last six months.

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer from which budgetary sub-head the costs of millennium compliance will be met for his Department. [32623]

Mrs. Liddell: The costs of the required compliance will largely be related to time spent by staff testing their systems with some expenditure on equipment and software and will be met from within the Treasury's administration costs.

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when all testing on Year 2000 compliance will be completed within his Department. [32621]

Mrs. Liddell: The target for completing all Year 2000 compliance testing within the Treasury is March 1999.

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) when National Savings will complete its conversion work to ensure its computer systems are fully millennium compliant; [32619]

(2) when he estimates the Office for National Statistics will complete its inventory of the work required to ensure its computer systems are fully millennium compliant; [32569]

(3) what contingency plans have been made in case of a failure by National Savings to ensure that its computers are fully protected against the Year 2000 problem; [32617]

(4) what contingency plans have been made in case of a failure by (a) the Inland Revenue and (b) the Office for National Statistics to ensure that their computers are fully protected against the Year 2000 problem; [32616]

(5) what is his latest estimate of the cost to (a) the Office for National Statistics, (b) National Savings and (c) the Inland Revenue of ensuring their computer systems are fully millennium compliant. [32615]

Mrs. Liddell: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner) on 3 March 1998, Official Report, column 622.

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he last met the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to discuss his Department's progress towards millennium compliance. [32622]

Mrs. Liddell: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer holds regular meetings with his Cabinet colleagues to discuss a range of issues.

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost to his Department of (a) consultants and (b) contractors engaged to address millennium computer compliance problems; and if he will list the consultants. [32625]

Mrs. Liddell: Neither consultants nor contractors have been engaged to address the millennium compliance problem in the Treasury.

Council of Economic Advisers

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the cost to date of the Council of Economic Advisers; and when he expects to appoint further members to it. [32594]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 3 March 1998]: The main cost of the Council, which advises the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the design and implementation of policies for the achievement of the Government's Economic objectives, relates to the salaries of the two members, whose appointments took effect from last September, and the cost of the secretarial support they receive. It is not the practice to give details of what individuals earn.

Employee Travel

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost of employee travel on office business, broken down into (a) fuel allowances, (b) unproductive time during travel, (c) other costs related to car transport and (d) costs related to public transport, for (i) 1994–95, (ii) 1995–96, (iii) 1996–97 and (iv) 1997–98. [32445]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 3 March 1998]: The estimated travel costs of Treasury staff for the years requested are:

£000

	(a) Fuel Allowances	(c) Car related costs	(d) Public Transport	Total
1994–95	—	15	729	744
1995–96	—	12	644	656
1996–97	—	8	717	725
1997–98	1	10	518	529

Notes:

Figures for (b)—unproductive time during travel—are not recorded and compilation of these figures would incur disproportionate cost.

Figures for (a), (c), and (d) in 1994–95 have been estimated from the total figures available.

Single Currency

Mr. Gray: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many meetings have taken place since 1996 involving the Association for the Monetary Union of Europe; and if he will make a statement on its activities in the United Kingdom. [32882]

Mrs. Liddell: Questions about the activities of the Association for the Monetary Union of Europe should be addressed to that organisation.

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the role of his Department in preparing European Community websites on the single currency. [32945]

Mrs. Liddell: The preparation of websites on the single currency by European Community institutions is a matter for these institutions. In some cases, documents and websites may contain information provided by HM Treasury.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will make a statement on the intended target audience of material printed by the European Commission on the single currency in English; [33010]

(2) how many speakers were provided by the European Commission for conferences in 1997 on the single currency; how many were provided for conferences in the United Kingdom; what steps are taken to ensure impartiality; from which budget line costs came; and if he will list the speakers and venues in the United Kingdom; [33012]

(3) what information kits are in preparation at European Community level to inform professional and business associations about the single currency. [33011]

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many copies of the video, "A Single Currency for Europe", have been distributed by Directorate General X in the United Kingdom. [32958]

Mrs. Liddell: These are matters for the European Commission.

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had on the timing of a referendum on UK entry to the single currency. [31795]

Mrs. Liddell: We have made it clear that we do not believe that the United Kingdom will be in a position to join a single currency, or to have a referendum on joining a single currency, during this Parliament. That is because there is no realistic prospect of Britain having demonstrated, during this Parliament, convergence which is sustainable and settled.

Valuation Office

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 23 February 1998, Official Report, column 60, what competitive process was used during the appointment of Mr. Michael Johns as Chief Executive of the Valuation Office Agency; what was the job specification; and in what ways equal opportunities criteria were met. [32849]

Dawn Primarolo: Mr. Michael Johns was made Chief Executive of the Valuation Office Agency by internal Civil Service appointment.

The Chief Executive is responsible for the efficient and effective management of the Agency, and is accountable for its performance to the Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue—and through the Chairman to Treasury Ministers. He is the Accounting Officer for the Agency's two Votes (for Administration, and for Contributions in Lieu of Rates).

Equal opportunities policy applying to all Civil Service appointments is set out in the Civil Service Management Code.

Developing Countries (Debt Reduction)

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the cost to the Exchequer of 80 per cent. official debt write-off for (a) all the countries likely to benefit from the Heavily Indebted Poor Country Debt Agreement and (b) all eligible countries. [33204]

Mrs. Liddell: (a) The debt relief granted to poor countries will depend on Debt Sustainability Analyses that the IMF, World Bank and representatives of the debtor country carry out as the country concerned nears a decision point. These analyses will depend on future economic developments in the individual countries.

(b) It is not known which other countries will be eligible for a reduction in the stock of their debt or what level of debt reduction these countries will receive. No useful estimation of the total cost of debt relief to the UK can therefore be made.

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which heavily indebted developing countries to which he referred in the Mauritius Mandate he estimates will have begun the process of debt reduction by the year 2000. [33206]

Mrs. Liddell: In his speech to Commonwealth Finance Ministers last year—the Mauritius Mandate—the Chancellor proposed that the international community make a commitment that every poor country identified under the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) initiative should have begun the process of securing debt relief by the year 2000.

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the cost to United Kingdom banks of their involvement in the HIPC debt reduction agreement. [33203]

Mrs. Liddell: This is a matter for the individual banks concerned.

Credit Unions

Mr. Caplin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will support the future development of credit unions. [33108]

Mrs. Liddell: The Government support fully the credit unions' ethos of self-help and thrift, and the encouragement they give people to save. We are actively examining ways to promote further growth while continuing the movement's current focus on poorer communities.

Pensions Mis-selling

Mr. Caplin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will encourage those major pension providers who have units dedicated to dealing with problems arising from mis-selling of personal pensions to make their expertise available to the independent financial adviser market. [33109]

Mrs. Liddell: The longer the scandal of pensions mis-selling continues, the greater the damage to the reputation of the UK financial services industry. Accordingly, it would be welcome if large firms were able to do what they could to assist independent financial advisers to process their reviews of personal pensions.

Public Borrowing

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 24 February 1998, Official Report, column 132, on public borrowing targets, if the targets are binding on those states not entering Stage Three of Economic and Monetary Union. [33211]

Mrs. Liddell: The excessive deficit procedure in Article 104(c) and Protocol No.5 of the Maastricht Treaty applies to all Member States, but a Member State that does not participate in Stage 3 of EMU cannot be fined even if its deficit or debt exceeds the reference values set out in Protocol No.5.

Cohesion Funding

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy that countries which fulfil Maastricht criteria should lose cohesion funding. [33289]

Mrs. Liddell: The Government believe that continuing Cohesion Fund receipts for Member States joining the single currency is difficult to reconcile with the original objectives of the Fund, particularly in view of the requirement on beneficiaries to submit a convergence programme, showing how they are to meet the Maastricht criteria.

Economic and Monetary Union

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what criteria have been adopted by (a) Her Majesty's Government and (b) the Commission of the European Community for determining that borrowing by national, regional and local governments and other publicly-funded bodies for investment which is to be included in those percentages of gross national product to be used as target figures for qualification for entry to Stage Three of Economic and Monetary Union. [33209]

Mrs. Liddell: Capital spending by central Government and local authorities increases the general government financial deficit and the stock of general government gross debt, the deficit and debt measures that are used in the excessive deficits procedure of the Maastricht treaty. There are no special criteria in the treaty that apply to publicly funded capital spending by national, regional and local governments and other publicly funded bodies.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy that no extra funding should be made available to EMU members to offset any impact of EMU on employment, wages and growth. [33287]

Mrs. Liddell: There are no such proposals.

Prawn Importers

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take steps during the United Kingdom Presidency to end the attempts retrospectively to fine importers of prawns from Iceland and the Faroes subsequently claimed by the European Commission to have originated in Russia. [33288]

Dawn Primarolo: We remain committed to finding an equitable solution to the issue of retrospective duty demands where goods imported under preferential tariff arrangements have subsequently proved not to qualify, and are giving high priority during our Presidency of the EU to making progress on this issue.

Abortions

Mr. Wood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many district health authorities paid for less than 75 per cent. of abortions requested by their residents in the last year for which figures are available. [33368]

Mrs. Liddell: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Chief Executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Mike Wood, dated 10 March 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your parliamentary question on the number of district health authorities paying for less than 75 per cent. of abortions.

In 1996, the latest year for which figures are available, there were 49 health authorities in England and Wales that paid for less than 75 per cent. of the abortions for their residents.

Inheritance Tax

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list by Scottish unitary authority or other convenient area, the numbers of landowners who receive conditional exemption from inheritance tax by virtue of allowing public access. [33472]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 23 February 1998, Official Report, columns 56–57.

VAT

Dr. Marek: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 25 February 1998, Official Report, column 234, relating to VAT relief on energy saving measures, if the measures proposed include relief on materials. [33050]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 6 March 1998]: Yes. The reduced rate we announced in the Pre-Budget Report will apply to the installation of energy saving materials, including the value of the materials themselves, to the extent that the installation is funded by grant schemes designed to assist the less well-off.

As the Customs and Excise report "Helping the Less Well-Off Save Energy" made clear, a reduced rate for materials alone, for DIY installation, would require agreement with other member states for changes to European law.

Retail Prices Index (EU)

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the elements used to calculate the RPI in each of the member countries of the EU together with their respective weightings; and if he will indicate what changes have been made in each of these lists since 1 January 1996. [33509]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 9 March 1998]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Chief Executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Tim Loughton, dated 10 March 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent question on the RPI.

The contents of the UK RPI "basket" of goods and services are revised annually, as are the weightings attached to each category of spending. Each year's list of items, together with the category weightings, are given in the RPI Business Monitor (March 1996 and April 1997 issues respectively), a copy of which is available in the House of Commons library.

Other Member States of the EU update the list of items in their national consumer price indices, and the weights associated with the items, at varying frequencies. The majority update every five years but there are a few which revise their weights annually, namely: France, Sweden and, from the start of 1998, the Netherlands. Information about the items used by other Member States of the EU is not available.

Public Bodies (Reports)

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the bodies within the responsibility of his Department currently required by legislation to lay a report before Parliament. [33548]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 9 March 1998]: Reports by the following bodies are laid before Parliament:

The Bank of England

The Building Societies Commission

The Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies

The Financial Services Authority

The Friendly Societies Commission

The Office for National Statistics

The Public Works Loan Board.

The report by the Bank of England includes a report by the Board of Banking Supervision.

Charities

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to relax the legal controls under the Trustee Investments Act 1961 in respect of investments by charities. [32879]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 9 March 1998]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Worthing, East and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) on 21 January 1998, Official Report, column 530.

Civil Servants

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number and percentage of civil servants in his Department, at each grade including and above higher executive officer who (a) attended university and (b) attended either Oxford or Cambridge University. [33077]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 9 March 1998]: Information about the universities attended by staff in the Treasury could be retrieved only at disproportionate cost. The table shows, by Treasury pay range, the numbers and percentages of staff (excluding special advisers and casuals, but including those Treasury staff working outside the department) with degree level qualifications:

Pay range	Number of staff	Proportion of total (%)
A	4	6
B	15	7
C	29	19
D	118	42
E	164	74
Senior Civil Service	104	97

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number of civil servants in his Department, at each grade, who received their schooling in the independent school sector. [33078]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 9 March 1998]: This information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate for each of the last five years, the number and percentage of new civil servants in his Department who attended Oxford or Cambridge University, broken down into the number of entrants joining the Department from (a) the regular Civil Service entrance procedure, (b) the fast stream and (c) the private sector. [33079]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 9 March 1998]: The table shows the number of Civil Service recruits joining the Treasury in the period 1993–97. It excludes special advisers and casual appointments. The numbers recruited through the fast stream competition and through other fair and open competitions include people who previously worked in the private sector. There was no recruitment competition restricted to applicants from the private sector. Information about universities attended by Treasury staff cannot be retrieved without disproportionate cost.

	Fast stream		Other competitions
	number	percentage	number	percentage
1993	13	16	66	84
1994	25	30	57	70

[30753]

Clare Short: The details requested in respect of staff employed by my Department are as follows:

Millennium Compliance

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions she has had with the World Bank on assistance to third world countries on the need for computer systems to be millennium compliant; and if she will make a statement. [33862]

Clare Short: My Department is part of an informal donor network organised by the World Bank on matters concerning information technology and international communications. Last week, the Government committed £10 million of grant aid to the World Bank Trust Fund for Information Development. These funds are earmarked for assisting poor countries to identify problems of millennium compliance, to design strategies to overcome the problem in priority areas and to provide technical co-operation in support of the solutions. I am ready also to consider providing support directly to poor developing countries.

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assistance is being given to UK-aided countries on the threat to health and immunisation records and on other problems arising from the need for computer systems to be millennium compliant; and if she will make a statement. [33863]

Clare Short: Last week, the Government committed £10 million to the World Bank's Trust Fund for Information Development to assist poor countries to identify problems of millennium compliance, to design strategies to overcome the problems in priority areas and to provide technical cooperation in support of the solutions. This could include help with health and immunisation records, but it is not possible to generalise about the extent to which health records are at risk in poor countries or what the solutions may be. I am also ready to consider providing support directly to poor developing countries.

Multilateral Agreement on Investment

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the time and place of the discussions that have taken place with developing countries on the Multilateral Agreement on Investment. [33819]

Clare Short: The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) has held consultations with developing countries on the Multilateral Agreement on Investment (MAI) in:

Wellington, New Zealand (April 1995)

Santiago, Chile (November 1995)

Hong Kong (March 1996)

Paris, France (April 1996)

Bled, Romania (June 1996)

Rio de Janeiro, Brazil (July 1996)

Rio de Janeiro, Brazil (February 1997)

Seoul, South Korea (April 1997)

Riga, Latvia (April 1997)

Paris (September 1997)

Cairo, Egypt (October 1997)

Mexico (December 1997).

The OECD Secretariat has also held regular meetings with non-OECD Members in Paris, on an individual and collective basis. In addition, OECD Members, including the UK, have held bilateral meetings in capitals with non-OECD Members. My Department will share the results of our forthcoming study of the development implications of the MAI widely with developing countries, on a bilateral and multilateral basis.

Public Appointments

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many of the appointments to public bodies which she has made since 1 May 1997 have been from the Public Appointments Unit list. [33249]

Clare Short: One such appointment has been made out of a total of five appointments.

Import Tariffs

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps she has taken to encourage elimination of tariffs on imports from the least developed countries. [32881]

Clare Short: Under the UK Presidency the EU has concluded discussions on how to implement its commitment to offer Lomé equivalent terms to the nine non-Africa, Caribbean, Pacific (ACP) Least Developed Countries (LDC's). The new terms will apply retrospectively from 1 January 1998. The EU has agreed to look at ways to further improve and extend preferential access to all the LDCs. The UK sees this as a priority and will continue to press within the EU and multilaterally for bound duty free access for all LDC products.

Trade Barriers

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on progress in dismantling trade barriers affecting developing countries. [32880]

Clare Short: The World Trade Organisation (WTO) held a High Level Meeting in October which resulted in a series of modest increased market access offers for Least Developed Countries (LDCs) by a number of developed and some more advanced developing countries. At this meeting the EU reaffirmed its commitment to offer Lomé equivalent terms to the nine non-Africa, Caribbean, Pacific LDCs, and terms were agreed in February under the UK Presidency. Progress on implementation of market access commitments will be reviewed at the WTO Ministerial which will take place in Geneva from 18–19 May.

HEALTH

Departmental Pay

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people employed by (a) his Department and (b) the National Health Service earn (i) less than £3.20 per hour, (ii) between £3.20 and £3.60 per hour, (iii) between £3.60 and £4 per hour and (iv) between £4 and £4.62 per hour. [30746]

Mr. Milburn [holding answer 23 February 1998]: At present there are no staff employed by the Department of Health who earn less than £3.60 per hour. 135 members of staff are paid between £3.60 and £4 an hour, and 140 staff are paid between £4 and £4.62 an hour.

For the National Health Service generally, I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) on 12 January 1998, Official Report, column 153.

Doctors and Dentists

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his Department's policies to ensure the existence of sufficient numbers of qualified doctors in the future. [29065]

Mr. Milburn: The Government's strategy to ensure that there are sufficient qualified doctors in the future is to increase training levels and address concerns about recruitment and retention. Our initiatives in this area include: new student funding arrangements, which reflect the special features of undergraduate medical education; further investment in undergraduate and postgraduate medical education, which should ensure future increases in doctor numbers; flexible and family-friendly training arrangements; continued attention to equal employment opportunities; the salaried doctors and improved retainer schemes within general practice; and opportunities within the Primary Care Act pilots.

Also, we are taking steps to ensure that doctors feel valued and involved. For example, the recent White Paper The New NHS promotes greater involvement of hospital doctors in the management of National Health Service trusts, and increases all doctors' influence over management decisions.

Finally, we have improved our workforce planning arrangements, to ensure that the supply of doctors reflects demand.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he is taking to ensure that doctors and dentists whose first language is not English have to demonstrate proficiency in English before being allowed to practise. [33291]

Mr. Milburn: Anyone who wishes to practise as a doctor or dentist in the United Kingdom must be first registered with either the General Medical Council (GMC) or General Dental Council (GDC).

In the case of most non European Economic Area (EEA) nationals the GMC and GDC must be satisfied that the practitioner meets the required level of professional and language competence before they are registered.

The GMC and GDC are obliged under European legislation to register EEA nationals with recognised EEA qualifications. It is therefore for employers and health authorities to satisfy themselves that potential employees or independent contractors possess the necessary skills including communication skills.

Community Hospitals

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money has been spent at community hospitals on providing intermediate care for rural areas in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement. [32432]

Mr. Milburn: Financial information is collected on the basis of National Health Service trusts and cannot be disaggregated between hospitals or types of hospital. However, information about expenditure on community health services by rural health authorities in England is set out in the table.

Expenditure on community health services by rural health authorities in England—1996/97

Kingston and West Middlesex Hospitals

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many vacancies there are in accident and emergency departments for doctors and nurses in (a) Kingston Hospital NHS Trust and (b) West Middlesex Hospital NHS Trust [32892]

Mr. Milburn: Figures on vacancies for doctors and nurses in National Health Service trusts are collected by the Office of Manpower and Economics and published in the annual reports of the Review Body for Nursing staff, Midwives, Health Visitors and Professions Allied to Medicines. Copies have been placed in the Library.

The hon. Member may also wish to contact Sir William Rous, Chairman of Kingston Hospital NHS Trust, and Jane Kelly, Chairman of West Middlesex Hospital NHS Trust, for details.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many finished consultant episodes there were in respect of the (a) Kingston Hospital NHS Trust and (b) West Middlesex Hospital NHS Trust in each of the last five years. [32891]

Mr. Milburn: The information is shown in the table.

Number of finished consultant episodes[1] for Kingston Hospital National Health Service Trust and West Middlesex Hospital NHS Trust since 1992–93

Year	Kingston Hospital NHS Trust	West Middlesex Hospital NHS Trust[2]

Accident Victims (Insurance)

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on progress in implementing his plans to make the insurers of those causing road accidents responsible for the NHS treatment costs of the accident victims. [33115]

Mr. Milburn: National Health Service trusts were asked in December 1997 to ensure that steps were taken to maximise income from the existing scheme to recoup the cost of treatment for certain road traffic accident victims. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health also announced that, when time permits, legislation will be introduced to revise the current arrangements.

Medical Negligence

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to introduce a fast-track compensation scheme for patients claiming compensation for medical negligence against the NHS. [33116]

Mr. Milburn: We have no plans to introduce such a scheme. However we are concerned at the cost of litigation to the National Health Service, which diverts resources away from patient care, and we are exploring ways of reducing this burden.

Hepatitis C

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assistance is currently available from his Department for people with haemophilia infected with hepatitis C through their NHS treatment; and what are his plans for future assistance. [33281]

Ms Jowell: The Department provides financial support to the Haemophilia Society, whose work includes assisting those with haemophilia who are infected with hepatitis C. The grants to the Society (which this year total £200,000) include support for a specific project to look into the best ways for the Haemophilia Society to support those of its members who are infected with hepatitis C and their families.

We are currently considering the level of future support for the Haemophilia Society, including their bid for additional funds to enable them to offer further practical help to those infected with hepatitis C.

The Department has also made a total of £1.5 million available over a two year period to aid research into hepatitis C, its natural history and optimal treatment. While primarily geared to improve the understanding of hepatitis C generally, any developments from this will be important to haemophiliacs infected with the hepatitis C virus.

Eye Examinations

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if it is the policy of the Government that all children in special schools for children with learning difficulties should have free domiciliary eye examinations; and if he will make a statement. [33041]

Mr. Milburn: The General Ophthalmic Services Regulations permit domiciliary visits to be made only to the place at which the patient normally resides. Children with learning difficulties in non-residential schools are entitled to free National Health Service sight tests at community optical practices.

Ambulances (Avon)

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many of the ambulances and similar vehicles operated by Avon Ambulance Service NHS Trust are (a) under one year old, (b) under three years old, (c) under five years old, (d) under seven years old and (e) over seven years old. [33286]

Mr. Milburn: Information received from Avon Ambulance Service National Health Service Trust shows that the age profile of their vehicle fleet is as follows:

	Accident and emergency vehicles	Patient transport vehicles	Support vehicles	Total
Under 1 year old	11	0	1	12

Asthma (Warrington)

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what estimate he has made of the number of diagnosed asthma cases in Warrington, North constituency (a) in the past 12 months and (b) over the past five years; [33639]

(2) if he will list the number of diagnosed asthma cases among children in Warrington, North constituency for each year since 1993. [33638]

Ms Jowell: The information requested is not collected centrally. However, it is possible to provide the numbers of residents in the electoral constituency of Warrington, North treated as an inpatient or day case in any hospital with the diagnosis of asthma—see table. This means that the reason for admission may not be asthma, but the patients were diagnosed as having asthma when treated on admission. The vast majority of asthma sufferers are treated by health services in the community and few require hospital treatment. My hon. Friend may, therefore, wish to contact Mr. Colin Hamer, Chairman at North Cheshire Health Authority, for further information.

Tuberculosis

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of discrepancies in health authorities practices in respect of the investigation of human TB on farms which experience bovine TB. [33729]

Ms Jowell: None. There are established procedures for the investigation and treatment of tuberculosis including the screening of contacts. Guidance on these matters is contained in the reports of the Interdepartmental Working Group on Tuberculosis, published in July 1996, copies of which are available in the Library, and in the publications of the British Thoracic Society and other specialist groups.

Prescription Charges

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to allow those on means-tested benefit to continue to receive the (a) free prescriptions and (b) other supplementary benefits available to those on income support. [33647]

Mr. Milburn: The Department is responsible for prescription charges and welfare foods. Prescription charges and entitlement to welfare foods are both elements of the Department's Comprehensive Spending Review, which will be completed by the summer. We remain committed to the historic principle of the National Health Service that health services will be available to all and access will be based on need, not on ability to pay.

The Department has no information about other benefits which may be available to recipients of Income Support which are the responsibility of other government departments.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Surveys

Mr. Forth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list each information, promotional, marketing and opinion survey contract, with its value, concluded by his Department and its agencies for the years (a) 1997–98, (b) 1998–99, (c) 1999–2000, (d) 2000–2001 and (e) 2001–2002. [32015]

Mr. Tom Clarke: The available information is given in the table:

In order to preserve commercial confidentiality, individual contract costs have not been identified. As the Historic Royal Palaces will cease to be a Government Agency with effect from the financial year 1998–99, information for the years after 1997–98 has not been included.

Tourism

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what funding his Department gives for the provision of tourist information about Britain on the Internet. [32942]

Mr. Tom Clarke: The British Tourist Authority's website costs approximately £200,000 a year to develop and maintain. Funding for it comes from the BTA's grant-in-aid (£35 million in 1997/98).

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what is his Department's assessment of the quality of tourist information about Britain currently made available on the Internet by (a) Government directly funded bodies, (b) other non-commercial organisations and (c) private companies. [32940]

Mr. Tom Clarke: The British Tourist Authority has an excellent website, which recently won a leading tourism technology award at the annual ENTER conference, beating off contenders from around the world. The site address is www.visitbritain.com. There are a great many other tourism-related sites on the Internet. As with all advertising media, the quality of these sites varies considerably.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what actions his Department can take against any (a) United Kingdom based organisation and (b) European Union based organisation which provides misleading or false tourist information about Britain on the Internet; and if his Department has taken any such action to date. [32943]

Mr. Tom Clarke: Advertisements made in connection with a business and placed on the Internet are subject to essentially the same regime throughout the European Union as advertisements in other media. In the United Kingdom, the British Codes of Advertising and Sales Promotion, operated by the Advertising Standards Authority, require all advertisements to be legal, decent, honest and truthful. Where an advertiser persistently disregards the adjudications of the Authority, the Director General of Fair Trading may take action in the Courts. Additionally, the Trade Descriptions Act 1968, enforced by local authority trading standards departments, makes it an offence for a trader knowingly or recklessly to make false or misleading statements about services, accommodation or facilities. Neither the Advertising Standards Authority nor trading standards officers can take action abroad.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will estimate the money allocated for tourism by (a) tourist boards, and (b) local authorities, per head for (i) Staffordshire and (ii) the West Midlands for each of the last 10 years. [33043]

Mr. Tom Clarke [holding answer 6 March 1998]: The Government fund the national tourist boards for specific activities and programmes, not on the basis of population.

The Heart of England Tourist Board includes Staffordshire and the West Midlands in its region. Each of the ten regional tourist boards (RTBs) in England is an independent company which raises money from membership subscriptions and commercial activities. Each RTB also receives a grant from the English Tourist Board (ETB). ETB grants to the Heart of England Tourist Board (HETB) in the last 10 years have been:

Year	ETB grant to HETB (£)
1987–88	151,178
1988–89	166,120
1989–90	313,300
1990–91	592,540
1991–92	472,106
1992–93	461,445
1993–94	438,462
1994–95	473,939
1995–96	465,640
1996–97	509,238

Source:
Heart of England Tourist Board.

Tourism in Staffordshire and the West Midlands also benefits from the work of the ETB, whose purpose is to assist the industry in increasing tourism expenditure in England, and the British Tourist Authority (BTA) which helps market the British tourism product abroad. My Department gives grant-in-aid to the ETB and BTA. This year the ETB received £9.9 million from my Department (£5.1 million of which it gives as grants to the Regional Tourist Boards), in addition to £2.9 million from the industry, and the BTA received £35 million in grant-in-aid plus £16 million from the industry.

As far as local authority spending is concerned, tourism promotion is not a mandatory local authority function but a discretionary one and funds are not allocated "per head" of population. Local authorities are free to make decisions on tourism funding as they see fit, on the basis of local needs and priorities. Estimates for local authority expenditure on tourism promotion, county by county, appear in the "English Heritage Monitor", published annually by English Heritage and the English Tourist Board.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the percentage of (a) domestic holiday makers and (b) overseas visitors to the United Kingdom who spend their holiday in England. [33815]

Mr. Tom Clarke: In 1996, 77 per cent. of UK domestic holiday makers' had holidays in England. In the same year 94 per cent. of overseas visitors to the UK visited England.

Digest of Tourism Statistics No. 21 and Travel Trends 1996 (IPS).

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what tourism initiatives he is undertaking in respect of (a) accommodation schemes and quality standards, (b) promoting England, (c) trade communication, (d) market and product intelligence and research, (e) training and (f) market access and information. [33811]

Mr. Tom Clarke: The English Tourist Board plans to take forward initiatives in each of these areas as part of its Agenda 2000 programme. I am working closely with the Tourism Forum and its Working Groups to develop an effective, comprehensive strategy for tourism which will benefit the whole of the industry into the next century.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what is the level of Government grant-in-aid to (a) the English Tourist Board, (b) the Welsh Tourist Board, (c) the Scottish Tourist Board and (d) the Northern Ireland Tourist Board, per head of population; and what proportion of the total number of (i) overseas and (ii) domestic tourists in the UK, holiday in each tourist board area. [33039]

Mr. Tom Clarke: Government grant-in-aid to each of the UK National Tourist Boards, expressed as per head of population, is as follows:

England	0.20

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what support he is giving to enable the English Tourist Board to undertake its Action 2000 programme. [33506]

Mr. Tom Clarke: The ETB, following consultation with the industry, has in its Action 2000 programme established clear priorities and is adopting a more strategic role. I was therefore pleased, in a difficult spending round, to be able to maintain the allocation for the ETB at the planned level which this Government inherited.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the grant-in-aid to the English Tourist Board in (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98 and (c) 1998–99. [33504]

Mr. Tom Clarke: The grant-in-aid to the English Tourist Board is as follows:

1996–97: £10.050 million

1997–98: £9.866 million

1998–99: £9.732 million.

The figures for 1996–97 and 1997–98 were set by the previous administration. I was pleased, in a difficult spending round, to be able to maintain the allocation for the ETB at the planned level which this Government inherited.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many organisations and local authorities were consulted as part of the English Tourist Board's Agenda 2000 consultative exercise. [33495]

Mr. Tom Clarke: The English Tourist Board arranged for Agenda 2000 publications to be distributed to 480 local authorities by the Local Government Association.

11 roadshows were held and these were attended by 327 local authority representatives, 123 questionnaires were completed by local authority representatives.

Publications

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list those European Commission (a) newsletters, (b) magazines and (c) occasional publications to which his Department subscribes. [33663]

Mr. Tom Clarke: The European Commission newsletters, magazines and occasional publications to which the Department for Culture, Media and Sport subscribes are:

1. Codis Focus (irregular).
2. European information [loose leaf folder of factsheets, leaflets and guides on the European Union] (irregular).
3. European Union database directory online and offline information services (irregular).

Masthead Programming

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations he has received in favour of allowing masthead programming on terrestrial television; and if he will make a statement. [33715]

Mr. Fisher: I have received representations on masthead programming from the Periodical Publishers Association. Restrictions on masthead programming are contained in the Independent Television Commission's Code of Programme Sponsorship and it is a matter for them as to whether those restrictions should be relaxed.

Departmental Pay

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many people employed by (a) his Department and (b) the agencies for which his Department is responsible earn (i) less than £3.20 per hour, (ii) between £3.20 and £3.60 per hour, (iii) between £3.60 and £4 per hour and (iv) between £4 and £4.62 per hour. [30751]

Mr. Tom Clarke [holding answer 23 February 1998]: No member of staff in the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and The Royal Parks Agency is paid less than £4.62 per hour. The number of staff employed by Historic Royal Palaces Agency earning less than £4 per hour is nil. The number of staff earning between £4 and £4.62 per hour is 18.

SCOTLAND

Departmental Pay

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people employed by (a) his Department and (b) the agencies for which his Department is responsible earn (i) less than £3.20 per hour, (ii) between £3.20 and £3.60 per hour, (iii) between £3.60 and £4 per hour and (iv) between £4 and £4.62 per hour. [30759]

Police

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received regarding administrative burdens on the police; and if he will make a statement. [33214]

Mr. McLeish: We have received no recent representations. The police have our full support and we are constantly looking at ways of reducing any burdens which deflect the police from their front line task of tackling crime—for instance by technological developments such as the Integration of Scottish Criminal Justice Information Systems and the Scottish Police Information Strategy.

Sequestration

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions banks and building societies have proceeded under summary diligence in cases of sequestration against individuals in Scotland in each of the last three years broken down by institution. [33540]

Mr. McLeish: These figures are not recorded centrally.

Scottish Tourist Board

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the grant-in-aid to the Scottish Tourist Board in (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98 and (c) 1998–99. [33505]

Mr. Wilson: The information is as follows:

Year	£ million
1996–97	18.309
1997–98	19.309
1998–99	19.309

Grant-in-aid for 1997–98 included £300,000 one-off funding to assist STB's efforts to increase tourism from the USA following the Congress of the American Society of Travel Agents, held in Glasgow in September 1997.

Grant-in-aid for 1998–99 represents an increase of £1 million over the planned provision which had been announced by the previous administration.

Nursery Education

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what resources are to be made available to local education authorities in 1998–99 to provide nursery education after the current voucher scheme ends. [31717]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 9 March 1998]: Total programme resources for pre-school education in 1998–99 are £75.6 million. Net of overheads and the cost of the final term of voucher grants for school year 1997–98, there will be approximately £50.6 million available to fund the first two terms of the 1998–99 school session and any other initiatives in pre-school education.

Using sources of funding other than pre-school education grant, local authorities have budgeted to spend a further £50.4 million on pre-school education in 1997–98. Authorities will be free to spend similar amounts in 1998–99 (net of the £13.6 million removed from the 1998–99 local government finance settlement to fund the final phase of the pre-school vouchers scheme).

Concordats

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many draft concordats his Department is currently preparing; who they are intended to be with; and what are the issues and matters covered by them. [33838]

Mr. Dewar: Officials in my Department are currently considering the areas in which concordats may be required between the Scottish Executive and Departments of the UK Government. It is too early to say how many such agreements, which cannot be made until the Scottish Executive is established, might be required. The guidance which I placed in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament on 27 February 1998 made clear that the range and subject matter of each concordat would depend upon the needs of the business area. The aim will be to ensure that the business of government in Scotland and at the United Kingdom level is conducted smoothly, by setting the ground rules for administrative co-operation, consultation and exchange of information. The guidance also indicated that all concordats should be published unless publication would cause substantial harm on one of the clearly defined grounds set out in the White Paper "Your Right to Know: Freedom of Information" (Cm.3818).

Legal Aid

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many applications for (a) advice and assistance and (b) civil legal aid have been made by individuals for judicial review of decisions by the Scottish Legal Aid Board refusing civil legal aid in each year since its inception. [33867]

Mr. McLeish: The only information available relates to civil legal aid applications in 1997, of which there were 38.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what is the policy of the Legal Aid Board on the level of remuneration of its law agents, where they are defending the Scottish Legal Aid Board against applications for judicial review of their decisions; [33868]

(2) if he will estimate the savings to public funds if the Scottish Legal Aid Board restricted to the legal aid rate remuneration to their law agents in each year since its inception. [33869]

Mr. McLeish: The policy of the Board is not to use the services of law agents in defending judicial reviews against the Board. The work is undertaken by the solicitors employed by the Board and therefore the question of the level of remuneration does not arise.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Housing

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on the religious affiliation of applicants for grants under the Housing (Northern Ireland) Order 1992. [32840]

Mr. Paul Murphy: This is matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, whose Chief Executive has advised me that, following a report from the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights, the Executive seeks to monitor the religious affiliations of applicants for grant aid. In order to do so, the Preliminary Inquiry form used in the scheme includes a relevant question. It is not compulsory to answer the question, nor does the answer, when given, have any bearing on the decision to approve or reject an application.

There are insufficient data, to date, to make a meaningful assessment of the impact of the grants scheme on applicants of particular religious persuasions.

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on the number of grants approved under the Housing (Northern Ireland) Order 1992, by district council area. [32838]

Mr. Paul Murphy: This is matter for the Northern Ireland Executive, whose Chief Executive has advised me that figures have been recorded by district council area only since 1 April 1994, and these are set out in the table. The total number of applications approved since October 1992, including those listed, is 50,781.

The figures cover the period from 1 April 1994 to 31 December 1997 and include Renovation, Replacement, Disabled Facilities, Houses in Multiple Occupation, Minor Works Assistance, and Repairs Grants.

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on the number of applicants from each district council area for grants under the Housing (Northern Ireland) Order 1992. [32839]

Mr. Paul Murphy: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, whose Chief Executive has advised me that formal applications are not normally made until there is a reasonable expectation that grant aid will be available. The number of applicants, therefore, can be regarded as almost synonymous with the number of grant approvals. The earliest stage in the process is the Preliminary Inquiry state, which gauges the number of potential applicants. There are a number of reasons why potential applicants do not become actual applicants including the failure of the property or the applicant to meet the criteria for particular grants, but no statistics are kept which would show the numbers of potential applications which do not progress. The numbers of Preliminary Inquiries received since October 1992 is 100,511. Figures have been recorded by district council area only since 1 April 1994 and these are as follows.

Council	Number of preliminary inquiries
Antrim	1,053
Ards	1,803
Armagh	3,977

The figures cover the period from April 1994 to 31 December 1997. Preliminary Inquiry Forms do not specify a particular grant. This is determined by the Executive and can include Renovation, Replacement, Disabled Facilities, Common Parts, Houses in Multiple Occupation, Minor Works Assistance and Repairs Grants.

Civil Servants

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if she will estimate for each of the last five years, the number and percentage of new civil servants in her Department who attended Oxford or Cambridge University, broken down into the number of entrants joining the Department from (a) the regular Civil Service entrance procedure, (b) the fast stream and (c) the private sector; [33070]

(2) if she will estimate the number of civil servants in her Department, at each grade, who received their schooling in the independent school sector. [33069]

Mr. Paul Murphy [holding answer 9 March 1998]: Information in the form requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Marriage

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans she has to review the civil law on the preliminaries to and the celebration of marriage. [34008]

Marjorie Mowlam: Existing Northern Ireland civil law on the preliminaries to and the celebration of marriage is based on nineteenth century legislation and is complex to administer. This, together with recent changes in the law in England and Wales and consultation on possible change in Scotland indicates a need to consider reform here. Accordingly, I have asked the Law Reform Advisory Committee, whose role is to keep the civil law of Northern Ireland under review, to examine the subject and to bring forward proposals as appropriate.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Departmental and Police Pay

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people employed by (a) his Department, (b) the agencies for which his Department is responsible and (c) the police earn (i) less than £3.20 per hour, (ii) between £3.20 and £3.60 per hour, (iii) between £3.60 and £4 per hour and (iv) between £4 and £4.62 per hour. No police officers earn less than £4.52 per hour.

Seventy-nine police cadets earn less than £3.20 per hour.

Figures are not available centrally for total numbers of police civilian staff and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Charity Funds

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps his Department takes to ensure that funds raised by charity collections go to the intended charities. [32549]

Mr. Michael: Public charitable collections are regulated by the Police, Factories, etc. (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1916, the House to House Collections Act 1939 and associated regulations, which provide that the local authority is responsible for granting licenses to organisations proposing to carry out collections. In London, the licensing authority is the Metropolitan Police or City of London Police. The Home Secretary has the discretion to issue Orders of Exemption to charities conducting house to house collections widely throughout England and Wales.

Part II of the Charities Act 1992, which came into effect on 1 March 1995, contains important controls in relation to professional and commercial involvement in charitable fund-raising.

The Charity Commission is responsible for the oversight of individual charities in England and Wales. It has powers under the Charities Act 1993 to investigate abuse where it appears that funds raised for charitable causes may be at risk and to remedy the misconduct and enforce the proper use of a charity's funds. The Commission itself does not have power to carry out prosecutions; this is a matter for the police.

The Commission is currently reviewing its own strategy for dealing with fund-raising concerns and is actively examining ways in which fund-raising abuse can be more effectively prevented.

Farm and Rural Watch Schemes

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the total financial support from his Department to farm watch and rural watch schemes, in each of the last three years for which figures are available; [32580]

(2) what was the total number of farm watch and rural watch schemes (a) in each area and (b) in total, in England and Wales, in each of the last three years for which figures are available; what is the estimated average number of people involved in each scheme; and if he will make a statement. [32581]

Mr. Michael: The Home Office has chosen to direct funding towards national initiatives designed to support and encourage the sort of activity which Watch schemes represent rather than funding local schemes. It would not be possible to fund every local scheme and, in any event, the essence of partnership is people getting together with the police to solve local problems at a local level. The Government do provide £0.75 million a year in core funding to Crime Concern, one of whose main activities is advising and developing crime prevention activities.

As both farm and rural watch schemes are run in conjunction with local police forces, the Home Office does not keep records of either the total number of schemes which are currently running throughout the country, or the estimated average number of people involved in each scheme.

The Crime and Disorder Bill will help to extend partnership activities by providing for new statutory duties for local authorities and the police to create an effective results-oriented framework for local action to tackle local problems. The nature of these problems will vary significantly from one area to another, and it is the Government's intention to allow maximum flexibility to reflect this. Rural areas, in common with urban and inner city areas, will benefit from this approach.

British Board of Film Classification

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to announce the appointment of the Vice-President of the British Board of Film Classification. [33146]

Mr. Michael: The principal officers of the British Board of Film Classification (BBFC) are appointed by the BBFC's Council of Management in consultation with my right hon. Friend, who is responsible under the Video Recordings Act 1984 for designating the authority for classifying video works. The Council of Management has recently advertised two vice presidential posts and will announce any appointments in due course.

Police Authorities (Out-of-court Settlements)

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the expenditure on out-of-court settlements by police authorities in England and Wales in the last year for which figures are available. [33104]

Mr. Michael: This information is not collected centrally. Claims are a matter for the police authority and the individuals concerned. The Home Office has no role to play in their resolution.

Vote Recounts

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which constituencies with majorities of (a) 0–0.6 per cent., (b) 0.6–1 per cent. and (c) 1–1.5 per cent. had recounts; and how many recounts there were in each constituency at the last general election. [33487]

Mr. George Howarth: This information will not be available centrally until claims for election expenses incurred in the conduct of the general election have been received from all acting returning officers. It is not possible to say when that will be.

Signal Flares

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will issue advice to members of search and rescue teams in (i) the Exmoor area and (ii) elsewhere regarding the (a) purchase and (b) use of flares to take account of the provisions of the Firearms (Amendment) (No. 2) Act 1997. [33480]

Mr. Michael: The recent changes to the law on handguns have not changed the law on signal flares. Firearms designed as signalling apparatus are specifically exempted from the ban on handguns.

Our firearms controls have always divided signalling equipment into two categories. Ordinary flares can be possessed by anyone, and are commonly used by sailors and hill walkers. Some flare launchers, such as the Verey flare pistol, have always been treated as firearms and need a certificate from the police. This has been the established legal position since the 1920s.

The Home Office agrees that search and rescue teams should be properly equipped to carry out their vital work. We are happy to discuss any concerns with the teams concerned and with the local police with a view to resolving any difficulties.

In the case of Exmoor search and rescue team, we understand that there was a misunderstanding among suppliers which has now been resolved, and the team can now continue to obtain the non-certificated flares needed.

Immigration Service

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of immigration service resources is devoted to (a) arriving passengers, (b) departing passengers and (c) asylum applicants. [33874]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: In the calendar year up to 31 December 1997:

(i) 66 per cent. of the Immigration Service Ports Directorate operational duties were deployed on the arrivals control:

(ii) 7 per cent. on the embarkation control: and

(iii) 11 per cent. on asylum related work.

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if all passengers leaving the UK are (a) liable to departure checks by the immigration service and (b) checked. [33871]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: (a) All passengers are potentially liable to a form of departure check. Under the Immigration Act 1971, an immigration officer may seek to establish whether or not a person leaving the country is a British citizen and, if he is not, his identity.

(b) In practice, about 40% of embarking passengers do not see an immigration officer. In 1994, embarkation checks were withdrawn from passengers departing from ferry ports and small airports for destinations within the European Union. Since then, the arrangements have been extended to all European Economic Area countries, that is: Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain and Sweden

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the cost and value of a comprehensive system of immigration service departure checks. [33873]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: No system would be totally comprehensive because there is no embarkation control between the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland. The cost of information technology for the most comprehensive system possible is likely to be about £73 million over a ten year period. The additional staffing cost, for ports, is estimated at about £7.2 million a year.

Such a system would provide better statistical information on overstaying but would not assist to any significant degree in the apprehension of immigration offenders, because they rarely remain at the address given on arrival. It would not help at all in respect of those who enter clandestinely.

It would, therefore, be expensive and not the most cost effective way of tackling abuse of the immigration control.

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what powers immigration officers have in performing departure checks. [33872]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The immigration officer undertakes departure checks to identify persons subject to control under the Immigration Act 1971 and, where necessary, records that departure. Under the Immigration Act, an immigration officer has the power to require the presentation of a passport or equivalent document, but has no express power to prevent departure.

MI5 Phoneline

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to set up a public telephone number on which members of the public will be able to offer information to the Security Service (MI5). [34081]

Mr. Straw: A new telephone number—the "MI5 Phoneline"—is today being established by the Security Service. The purpose of the Phoneline is to make it easier for people to pass on information which could help the Service do its work. The Phone will not serve as a general inquiry point about the Security Service. Inquiries should continue to be addressed, in writing, to the Security Service at The Enquiries Desk, PO Box 3255, London, SW1P 1AE.

For those who wish to provide information to the Security Service, the number is 0171 930 9000.

Roisin McAliskey

Mr. Stephen Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the German Government's request for Roisin McAliskey's extradition. [34108]

Mr. Straw: The German Government had requested Roisin McAliskey's return to stand trial for offences relating to the bombing of Osnabruck barracks in June 1996.

I have decided that I will not order Roisin McAliskey's return to Germany because I consider that the medical evidence in her case would make extradition unjust or oppressive. The Home Secretary has a general discretion to refuse extradition in any individual case, and is obliged to do so if it would, having regard to all the circumstances of the individual, be unjust or oppressive to do so. This discretion is preserved in section 12 of the Extradition Act 1989.

I have explained my decision to the German Government. It does not reflect in any way on the fairness of the German legal system or on the quality of the German extradition request. The United Kingdom enjoys excellent working relationships with Germany in the field of extradition and international co-operation against terrorism.

Premier Prisons

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if the contract between his Department and Premier Prisons requires Premier Prisons to abide by his Department's rules; [33719]

(2) if he will place in the Library the contract between Premier Prisons and his Department. [33721]

Ms Quin: There are four contracts between the Prison Service and Premier Prison Services. These cover the prisons at Doncaster and Lowdham Grange, and the provision of the court escort service in South and South East England, and the West Midlands and Mid Wales. All contracts require Premier Prison Services to operate in accordance with the relevant statutory regulations, including the Prison Rules 1964 and subsequent amending rules.

Copies of the contracts for Doncaster and for Lowdham Grange are in the Library. These copies exclude a limited amount of commercially sensitive financial information. I am arranging for copies of the court escort contracts with Premier Prison Services to be placed in the Library, excluding commercially sensitive financial information.

World Cup

Mr. Connarty: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions have taken place with football supporters' organisations regarding safety of British fans at this year's World Cup in France. [31804]

Mr. Michael: My right hon. Friend recently hosted a European conference to focus international efforts to combat soccer violence and consider the safety and security arrangements for the World Cup Finals in France. Supporters' groups were represented at the conference by the Football Supporters Association, the National Federation of Football Supporters Clubs and the Scottish Federation of Football Supporters' clubs.

In addition, the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) recently met a representative of the Scottish Federation of Football Supporters' Clubs. A meeting will shortly be arranged with the supporters' groups and the Chairman of the United Kingdom World Cup Co-ordinating Group to enable a further exchange of views.

Some British citizens will be travelling to France to support other teams participating in the tournament, particularly the national teams of Jamaica and Nigeria. Officials are arranging to meet relevant representative groups to discuss any concerns which they may have about protecting the interests of those supporters.

Prison Health Service

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list each (a) internal and (b) external review which is currently being undertaken into the Prison Health Service (i) in the regions and (ii) nationally. [33635]

Ms Quin: Prison health care is either the main focus or forms a significant dimension of the following current reviews:

National

- Organisation and delivery of prisoners' health care (Joint Prison Service/National Health Service Working Group).
- Nursing policy: role and qualifications of nurses and health care officers in prisons (internal).
- Drug strategy: balance between control and treatment measures (internal).
- Health care screening of prisoners on reception (internal).
- An evaluation of the effectiveness of drug treatment programmes (external consultants).

Regional

- Strategic health care review in North West region (internal).
- Review of health care provision—Isle of Sheppey prisons (internal).

Studies into health care provision at 13 prisons in Durham, East Anglia, Surrey and Yorkshire (external consultants).

Study into the needs of elderly and disabled prisoners at four prisons in Lancashire (external consultants).

South Korea

5. Mrs. McGuire: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the UK's relations with South Korea. [31799]

Mr. Fatchett: We have an important political and economic partnership with the Republic of Korea. We congratulate Korea on the democratic milestone represented by the election of President Kim Dae-jung, a long-time campaigner for democracy and human rights. We are giving significant support to help Korea overcome its economic difficulties, both bilaterally and through the IMF. We fully support efforts to bring about a lasting peace on the Korean peninsula. We look forward to welcoming President Kim to London for ASEM II in April.

17. Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the future role of the British Council in assisting UK exports. [31814]

Mr. Fatchett: Much of the Council's work demonstrates British excellence in the field of education and culture and hence supports and underpins exports in these areas. The Council has long been actively involved with the FCO, DfEE and DTI in promoting the use of British educational goods and service overseas, and study in Britain. In addition, the Council has commissioned research into the opportunities for increasing exports of the creative industries and is embarking on a number of pilot projects in this area. The Council will also pay an active role in the new Creative Industries Export Promotion Advisory Group which will involve both government and representatives of the cultural industries.

20. Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with other G7 countries relating to the political and financial problems in Indonesia. [31817]

We have contact at official level with G7 partners on its political ramifications, and will discuss the issue fully in Birmingham.

I also recently visited Thailand, Malaysia, Indonesia and Singapore in order to discuss the current financial difficulties.

Kuwait

21. Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Britain's relations with Kuwait. [31818]

Mr. Fatchett: Our relations with Kuwait are very good. I am visiting Kuwait on 11 and 12 March to take forward discussions on a wide range of issues, including our trade interests and close defence co-operation. We are particularly grateful to the Kuwaiti government and people for the generous welcome and political support shown to our forces stationed there.

Middle East Peace Process

22. Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Britain's role in the middle east peace process. [31820]

Friend the Foreign Secretary also chaired an EU Political Dialogue meeting with Albania on 27 January. I visited Albania on 4–5 February and held talks with Prime Minister Nano and members of his Government, and the opposition leader, Dr. Berisha. In all these discussions, we have stressed the need for the maintenance of constitutional government in Albania.

EU Common Foreign and Security Policy

24. Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Government's policy regarding a common European foreign policy. [31822]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Creating a more effective common European foreign and security policy is a key plank in the Government's European policy.

29. Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures he will pursue to promote common EU foreign policies. [31827]

Mr. Doug Henderson: We are committed to making the EU's common foreign and security policy more effective.

As EU Presidency, we have successfully promoted a common EU line on key foreign policy issues of the day.

We are taking forward EU preparations for implementation of the Amsterdam Treaty provisions to improve the quality of CFSP advice to the Council, to streamline CFSP decision-making, and to improve the external representation of the Union.

Departmental Commercial Sections

25. Ms Rosie Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on commercial sections' priorities for 1998–99. [31823]

Gulf States

28. Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about relations between the UK and the Gulf states. [31826]

Mr. Fatchett: The Gulf is an area of key importance for both the EU and the UK, strategically, economically and commercially. The EU's 1988 Cooperation Agreement with the Gulf Cooperation Council embodies the wide range of our shared interests. Britain has enjoyed friendly relations with the Gulf states for many years. We are therefore well-placed as EU Presidency to encourage greater cooperation and enhance relations.

Iraq

30. Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which of the member states of the European Union expressed support for the United Kingdom in its policy regarding preparations for military action against Iraq. [31828]

Libya

33. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations with Libya. [31831]

Mr. Fatchett: Our relations with Libya are intimately linked with the issue of Lockerbie, the associated UNSCRs and the murder of WPC Fletcher. It is difficult to envisage a normal relationship with Libya until these issues are resolved.

Mr. Fatchett: We continue to support UN Security Council resolutions 242, 338 and 425. We believe that the negotiating framework laid down at Madrid and Oslo based on these resolutions and the principle of "land for peace" offers the best prospect of a just, lasting and comprehensive peace in the Middle East.

"InfEuro" Newsletter

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many copies of the European Commission newsletter "InfEuro" are distributed in the United Kingdom. [32944]

"Britain in Europe" Pamphlet

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what financial assistance was available from the European Community for the publication of the booklet, "Britain in Europe"; and from which budget the money originated. [32883]

Mr. Doug Henderson: None. The publication was funded entirely by commercial advertising and sponsorship.

Information (Distribution)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what volume of (a) magazines, (b) fact sheets, (c) booklets and (d) video cassettes, receiving funding from the European Commission, were distributed in the United Kingdom in 1997. [33483]

Mr. Doug Henderson: This information is not readily available and could be assembled only at disproportionate cost.

ASSIST Programme

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will be promoting (a) the ASSIST programme and (b) the Human Rights Project Fund during his forthcoming visits to (i) Thailand, (ii) Malaysia, (iii) Indonesia and (iv) Singapore. [33150]

Mr. Tony Lloyd [holding answer 6 March 1998]: The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett), visited the countries concerned on 3–5 March as a special representative of the EU Presidency to discuss South East Asia's recent financial difficulties. This was not an appropriate occasion on which to address bilateral programmes.

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on proposed action by Her Majesty's Government relating to the destruction of Pan Am 103, following his meeting with the representatives of the relations of British victims of the Lockerbie crime. [31934]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will be happy to write to my hon. Friend following his meeting with the Lockerbie families. He expects to meet them early next month.

Mexico

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made regarding human rights in Mexico. [31807]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary discussed the human rights situation in Mexico with the new Foreign Minister, Mrs. Green, on 12 February in Panama City. He made clear our concerns that those arrested in connection with the massacre in Chiapas should be brought to trial; and that there should be no impunity for those with connections with municipal or state government. I discussed human rights issues with Mrs. Green's predecessor last November.

Burma

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken since August 1997 to put pressure on the SLORC in Burma to improve its record on human rights. [33740]

Mr. Fatchett: We are working closely with EU and other partners to press the Burmese regime (now called the State Peace and Development Council) to improve its record on human rights. In December, we co-sponsored a UN Resolution on human rights in Burma. This month, we shall introduce a resolution on Burma at the UN Commission on Human Rights. We are also using our EU Presidency to renew a tough package of EU-wide measures against the Burmese Government. We continue to urge EU partners to extend these measures. We have also secured EU consensus for a programme of positive measures aimed at strengthening civil society and delivering humanitarian aid in Burma.

Chernobyl

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the state of repair of the Chernobyl sarcophagus. [33737]

Mr. Fatchett: The safety of the Chernobyl sarcophagus is the responsibility of the Government of Ukraine. There is, however, broad international consensus that urgent action is needed to deal with the deterioration of the current structure. A shelter Implementation Plan (SIP) has now been agreed between Ukraine and G7 countries. Its aim is to stabilise the current shelter over the remains of the destroyed Unit 4 at Chernobyl; to remove the danger of a further explosion and finally to construct a temporary confinement to facilitate the removal of the most unstable parts. Implementation of the SIP has already started and efforts to ensure sufficient funding are underway.

Gibraltar

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 3 March 1998, Official Report, column 513, what plans he has during the United Kingdom presidency for an initiative to overcome legal obstacles to enfranchisement for Gibraltarians by changing European Union law. [33683]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Our approach to the Presidency on Gibraltar-related issues was set out in my answer to the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) of 6 February 1998, Official Report, column 843. On my hon. Friend's particular point, we have no present plans to pursue the sort of initiative he describes, when the chances of agreement are so uncertain, and we have other priorities to pursue on Gibraltar's behalf.

China

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on recent European Union decisions regarding human rights in China. [32203]

Mr. Fatchett: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley) on 5 March 1998, Official Report, column 711.

Buildings Refurbishment

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is his estimate of the cost of buildings refurbishment carried out by his Department in (a) 1995–96, (b) 1996–97, (c) 1997–98 to date and (d) 1997–98 full year; and if he will make a statement. [26672]

Mr. Hoon: The costs of refurbishment schemes are not monitored separately from other maintenance and improvement works and could be produced only at disproportionate cost. However, total figures for the Department, including the Court Service, are: (a) £26.3 million for 1995–96, (b) £19.4 million for 1996–97, (c) £6.5 million for 1997–98 to end December and (d) an estimated £19.4 million for 1997–98 full year. The majority of this has been spent by the Court Service to improve the facilities available in courts; £7 million was spent in 1995–96 accommodating most departmental headquarters staff in a single building and housing the newly created Court Service agency headquarters.

Magistrates Courts

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what criteria determine the composition of Magistrates Courts Committees; and how they are appointed. [33718]

Mr. Hoon: Magistrates' Courts Committees (MCC) are composed of local magistrates who are appointed by their colleagues, on the basis of the skills and experience they bring to the committee.

The framework for the appointment of MCC members is set out in the Magistrates' Courts Committees (Constitution) Regulations 1994. Broadly, each bench in an MCC area elects a prescribed number of its members to operate as a Selection Panel. The selection panel is informed by the incumbent MCC how many new members are required for the following year. A written notice of application is required, containing details of qualifications and experience. Candidates for appointment to the committee must be nominated by a justice and seconded by three other justices. Each selection panel determines its own method of selecting members to the MCC (whether through selection or election). Where a committee believes that additional skills are required which can only be provided by an individual who is not a magistrate, it is open to them to seek the Lord Chancellor's approval for a co-option to take place.

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what are the powers of Magistrates Courts Committees in respect of the closure of local courts. [33716]

Mr. Hoon: Under section 56 of the Justices of the Peace Act 1997, decisions concerning the future of a magistrates court are for the relevant magistrates courts committee to determine, after consultation with the paying authority or authorities. The local authorities that contribute financially to the running of the service may appeal to the Lord Chancellor against a proposed closure. The procedure for such appeals is set out in section 56 of the Justices of the Peace Act 1997.

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department to what extent Magistrates Courts Committees are required to take into account (a) local opinion, (b) the opinion of the Magistrates' bench and (c) the opinion of the local district council before deciding to close a local court. [33717]

Mr. Hoon: The Justices of the Peace Act 1997 requires a magistrates courts committee to consult its local paying authority before making a determination to close a courthouse.

My Department does, however, encourage magistrates courts committees to extend their consultation processes wider than that required by the Justices of the Peace Act 1997 and to consider all representations received before making a final determination.

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the average size of population covered by a local Magistrates Court. [33720]

Mr. Hoon: At April 1997, there were 492 full-time and part-time magistrates courthouses in use. The average population covered by a courthouse is around 106,000.

Conditional Fee System

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what assessment the Lord Chancellor has made of the possibility that, under the conditional fee system, solicitors will not be found for the cases with less prospect of success. [33641]

Mr. Hoon: I think that there are likely to be cases where the prospects of success are not strong enough for solicitors to undertake a conditional fee agreement. However, we do not believe that weak cases ought to be brought whether through legal aid or conditional fees.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what assessment he has made of the possibility of people being deterred from taking legal action as a result of change from legal aid to conditional fees. [33640]

Mr. Hoon: We believe that clients with good cases will be able to find lawyers to take personal injury claims once these are removed from legal aid. Some 35,000 people have already used conditional fee agreements in this area, lawyers are experienced in taking cases on a conditional fee basis and there is a developed insurance market to provide protective insurance for clients. We welcome responses to the proposals in the consultation paper and if the hon. Member has views on how conditional fees could be made more attractive, I would be glad to receive them.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans the Lord Chancellor has to ensure that solicitors can be found for personal injury cases with only an even chance of success. [33642]

Mr. Hoon: If a case has a reasonable prospect of success, a solicitor would be prepared to undertake it on a conditional fee. We do not believe that cases ought to be brought unless they have a strong prospect of success. I do not see that the legal aid budget, paid for by the taxpayer, should pay for a case if a solicitor does not think it has strong enough prospects to take it on under a conditional fee.

Legal Aid

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, pursuant to his oral statement of 4 March 1998, Official Report, columns 1059–63, if industrial diseases claims will remain within the scope of legal aid. [33627]

Mr. Hoon: Subject to consultation, I would not expect these cases to remain within the scope of legal aid. I would welcome any views which the hon. Member would like to contribute during the consultation period which ends on 30 April this year.

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, pursuant to his oral statement of 4 March 1998, Official Report, columns 1059–63, what is the total sum that will be paid into the Transitional Fund; and when it will be established. [33628]

Mr. Hoon: The resources allocated to the transitional fund will be determined each year depending upon the total legal aid budget and the priorities for spending elsewhere. I anticipate that the fund will be established by the end of the year.

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, pursuant to his oral statement of 4 March 1998, Official Report, columns 1059–63, when he will introduce legislation to establish the Public Interest Fund. [33629]

Mr. Hoon: We plan to publish a White Paper in the Summer. This will set out our plans for longer-term reform, including seeking a new Bill, and will also set out our plans for assisting cases with a significant public interest.

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, pursuant to his oral statement of 4 March 1998, Official Report, columns 1059–63, what is the total sum to be paid into the Public Interest Fund; and what will be the source of that money. [33630]

Mr. Hoon: Until we have new legislation, we cannot establish a Public Interest Fund. However, we do intend to provide, under transitional arrangements, for personal injury cases excluded from legal aid which have a wider public interest, to continue to receive public subsidy until we can set up new arrangements with new legislation.

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what research he has commissioned into the reasons for the scale of increase of the cost of civil and family legal aid over the last seven years; and if he will publish it. [33634]

Mr. Hoon: Neither I, nor the previous administration, have commissioned research into this area.

DEFENCE

Consultants

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his estimate of the expenditure of his (a) Department, (b) agencies and (c) non-departmental public bodies on external consultants in (i) 1995–96, (ii) 1996–97, (iii) 1997–98 to date and (iv) 1997–98 full year; and if he will also estimate the cost savings resulting from the employment of such consultants for each of the above years. [26633]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 5 February 1998]: The total expenditure on external consultancy by the Ministry of Defence including agencies, for which a separate breakdown is not available, was £150.8 million in financial year 1995–96, and £136.7 million in financial year 1996–97. Details of this expenditure are placed in the Library of the House around June of each year.

The comparable figures for non-departmental public bodies not included in the Departmental totals have been recalculated and the figures are now assessed to be £77,503 during 1995–96 and £183,109 in 1996–97.

This year's exercise to calculate expenditure on external consultancy within MOD during financial year 1997–98 will be complete by early summer, when I will write to the hon. Member. I will also place a copy of my letter in the Library of the House.

Individual budget holders in the MOD have delegated powers to employ external consultants as they judge necessary, consistent with requirements for propriety and value for money. External consultants are engaged for assistance on a wide range of problems, but very seldom with the sole aim of securing financial savings. We do not, therefore, specifically assess cost savings as a result of the employment of external consultants.

Prisoners of War

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence in compiling his report on the pay of prisoners of war during World War II, what account the Government took of whether or not the terms of the 1929 Geneva Convention were fulfilled in respect of reimbursing enemy Governments for payments by them to the British prisoners of war during the Second World War. [32264]

Mr. Spellar: The Review was fully aware of, and the Report covers, the 1929 Geneva Convention on the treatment of Prisoners of War of an enemy power and the question of the settlement of national debts between belligerents at the end of hostilities.

The Convention provided for the provision by the Detaining Power of some pay for officer Prisoners of War in the camps and that after the war this money would be refunded to each Detaining Power by the officers' own country. These matters were however subject to any special arrangements or agreements which the belligerent powers might make during and after the war.

At the time of the Peace Treaty with Italy, a mutual waiver of all claims in respect of Prisoners of War was agreed. Since for Germany no national authority existed with whom a settlement of this kind could be made, there was de facto a mutual waiver of claims, including those relating on both sides to Prisoners of War.

As the Report makes clear, the administration of servicemen's pay matters was a subject for their own Government. Deductions from home pay accounts in respect of payments made under the Geneva Conventions were not governed by these Conventions, but were a matter of British service pay policy.

Trident

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the recent report of the United States Department of Energy's Albuquerque operations office on the work of the Mason and Hanger Corporation on Trident weapons assembly for the United Kingdom. [33110]

Mr. George Robertson: Neither the Mason and Hanger Corporation nor any other United States organisation carries out Trident weapons assembly for the United Kingdom. Without a more specific reference it is not possible to identify the report to which my hon. Friend refers.

Millennium Compliance

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the responsibility for the millennium compliance of computer-reliant military equipment supplied by the United States of America lies with the vendors; and if she will make a statement. [33314]

Mr. Spellar: When MOD purchases direct from a US company, it prefers to place contracts under English Law, which places the vendor under the same obligations as a UK company. In all such contracts with US companies it is a requirement that they be contractually bound to meet the MOD's Year 2000 compliance requirements and to provide an express warranty to this effect. When MOD contracts directly with US companies under US laws for the procurement of computer systems and software, a similar compliance requirement is included.

In cases where MOD procures on a Government to Government basis through the Foreign Military Sales, FMS, route with the US, the vendors are required to comply with the relevant US Government criteria. The US Government are committed to achieving Year 2000 compliance of Defence equipment.

UK Visiting Forces (USA)

RAF Leeming

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what tours for non-defence persons have taken place at RAF Leeming since 1 May; what was the purpose of such tours; what funds were raised through these tours; how such funds were defrayed; and if he will make a statement. [33644]

Mr. Spellar: Since 1 May 1997 to date RAF Leeming has hosted 104 non-defence visits which serve to generate a constructive relationship with the local community, including raising funds for local charities. Such visits have a minimal impact on the Station and its personnel and are conducted at no cost to the public purse.

Gibraltar

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 5 February 1998, Official Report, column 261, if he will provide the geographical location of (a) Regional Command South and (b) the new NATO headquarters for GIBMED. [33632]

Dr. Reid: The headquarters for Regional Command South in NATO's future command structure will be based at Naples, Italy. On the NATO command arrangements for Gibraltar which will apply under NATO's future command structure, I refer my hon. Oil Spillages

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what measures his Department is taking to protect the breeding populations along the Welsh coastline from oil spillages. [32579]

Mr. Win Griffiths: A number of Welsh marine sites are being considered for designation as Special Areas of Conservation under the European Council Habitats

Directive. Management plans are being drawn up for these sites in consultation with all relevant authorities, including those with shipping interests. In October, my right hon. Friend submitted the Pembrokeshire Islands, which incorporates the busy Milford Haven waterway, as a candidate SAC.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions is also taking measures to prevent accidental spills. These include the rigorous enforcement of international rules and standards and the funding of three emergency towing vessels, including one in the South Western Approaches. In addition, international agreement has been obtained to a ban on virtually all operational discharges in UK waters, penalties for offenders have been increased, and port waste management planning is now mandatory for all ports, harbours and marinas.

LG Factory (Suppliers)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many companies in Wales the industry section of the Welsh Office has assisted to act as suppliers to the new LG factory in Gwent; and if he will make a statement. [32977]

Mr. Hain: Current information available from the Welsh Development Agency's Source Wales, which itself has matched Wales-based suppliers to LG, shows that there are twenty two Wales-based suppliers to the company. However, we know that there are many other suppliers dealing direct with the company and with AMEC, Tarmac and their sub-contractors, which do not yet feature on the Source Wales database. The Agency is endeavouring to gather this information to provide a more complete picture.

Of the twenty two suppliers identified, a number have been supported under the Regional Selective Assistance Scheme or the Regional Innovation Grant Scheme, most of which pre-date the LG announcement. None of these have been supported for projects specifically to supply LG although the impact of that earlier support could well have helped the companies provide a service to LG.

I would not expect there to be many requests for support specifically to supply LG. Experience shows that businesses, whether they be indigenous or inward investors, want a diverse customer and supply base. While LG is already in production, that production is limited at this stage. I am confident that other Wales-based companies will do business with LG as the project progresses and develops and I am doing all I can to encourage this.

Health Service (Waiting Times)

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people have been waiting for longer than 18 months for treatment in (a) Bro Taf and (b) the Gwent Health Authority area. [33238]

Mr. Win Griffiths: The information requested is given in the table.

Area	Number	Percentage of the total list
Bro Taf	509	3
Gwent	573	4

Notes:
1. In Bro Taf, 97% of those waiting for inpatient/daycase treatment had waited less than 18 months.
2. In Gwent, 96% of those waiting for inpatient/daycase treatment had waited less than 18 months.

Health Service (Waiting Times)

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people have been waiting for longer than 12 months for treatment in the (a) Bro Taf, (b) Gwent, (c) Dyfed Powys and (d) Iechyd Morgannwg Health Authority areas. [33237]

Mr. Win Griffiths: The information requested is given in the following table:

Area	Number	Percentage of the total list
Bro Taf	2,420	14
Gwent	2,047	14
Dyfed Powys	1,538	11
Iechyd Morgannwg	721	7

Across Wales, 89 per cent. of those waiting for inpatient or day case treatment had waited less than 12 months.

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people have been waiting for in-patient treatment for longer than (i) 12 and (ii) 18 months in the North Wales Health Authority area. [33307]

Mr. Win Griffiths: At the end of December 1997, 94 per cent. of Welsh residents in the North Wales Health Authority area waited less than 12 months for in-patient or day-case treatment and over 99 per cent. waited less than 18 months. 856 people (6 per cent. of those on the waiting list) had waited more than 12 months, and 65 people (0.6 per cent.) had waited more than 18 months.

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people have been waiting for in-patient treatment for longer than 18 months in the (a) Dyfed Powys and (b) Iechyd Morgannwg Health Authority area. [33308]

Mr. Win Griffiths: The following is the information:

Dyfed Powys: 401 (3 per cent. of the total list)

Iechyd Morgannwg: 234 (2 per cent. of the total list)

In Dyfed Powys 97 per cent. of those waiting for in-patient/daycase treatment had waited less than 18 months for treatment;

In Iechyd Morgannwg 98 per cent. of those waiting for in-patient/daycase treatment had waited less than 18 months for treatment.

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on (a) current hospital waiting lists and (b) hospital waiting lists in April 1997 in respect of hospital trusts in (a) Gwent, (b) Dyfed Powys, (c) Bro Taf, (d) North Wales and (e) Iechyd Morgannwg health authority areas. [33338]

Mr. Win Griffiths: The information is as set out in the table.

Non-domestic Rates

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to allow local authorities to set the level of the non-domestic rate for their areas. [33318]

Mr. Win Griffiths: My right hon. Friend will consult shortly on his proposals for the operation of non-domestic rates in Wales. No changes to the present arrangements will be made until there has been full consultation with representatives of the business community and with local government.

Employment Measures

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many jobs have been created or safeguarded in Wales through assistance from public funding in (a) 1996–97 and (b) 1997–98; what is the estimated number for 1998–99; and how many of these jobs were created or safeguarded as a result of negotiations commenced after 1 May 1997. [33283]

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many jobs were secured through assistance provided from public funds in 1996–97; how many he estimates will have been so secured in (a) 1997–98 and (b) 1998–99; and of those how many will be as a result of negotiations begun after 1 May 1997. [33278]

Mr. Hain: A range of services, including grant support, is provided by the Welsh Office, the Welsh Development Agency, the Development Board for Rural Wales, the Wales Tourist Board, the Training and Enterprise Councils, local authorities and other business development organisations. Information on all these is not held centrally in the form requested.

The following information relates to Regional Selective Assistance (RSA), the main form of regional aid in Wales. Grant is paid in instalments triggered by the achievement of agreed capital expenditure or job targets; details of jobs achieved are provided at each payment stage.

In 1996–97, £88 million RSA was offered toward 182 projects. This amount was in total associated with the creation or safeguarding of 13,953 jobs over the estimated 3 to 5 year life of each project. Latest figures confirm the achievement of 3,308 jobs on projects where some payment has been made.

Applications for assistance received after 1 May 1997 have so far resulted in £34.4 million RSA offered toward 97 projects with the creation or safeguarding of 7,158 jobs. To date 286 jobs have been achieved.

As RSA is a demand-led scheme it is not possible to make estimates of jobs expected from offers which may be made in 1998–99.

Welsh Language Road Signs

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of the cost of providing Welsh language road signs in (a) Monmouthshire, (b) Denbighshire, (c) Flintshire and (d) Newport in the last available year. [33277]

Mr. Hain: None; the information requested is not collected centrally.

Inward Investment and Trade Missions

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the inward investment and trade missions sponsored by his Department in (a) 1996–97 and (b) 1997–98 and those planned for 1998–99 and the orders and jobs secured and expected to be secured by each. [33276]

Mr. Hain: Details of inward investment and trade missions undertaken and planned to date for the years in question are set as follows:

Trade missions

Trade missions undertaken in 1996–97 generated actual orders of just over £7 million and prospective orders of over £34.6 million. Trade missions undertaken in 1997–98 generated actual orders of just over £1.8 million and prospective orders of over £33.6 million. Details of numbers of jobs created are not collected but, of the companies involved in 1996–97, 60 have created new jobs and a further 27 expect to create employment opportunities. Of the companies involved in missions in 1997–98, 65 have reported job creation and a further 8 expect to create additional jobs.

Inward investment missions

The Welsh Office does not sponsor inward investment missions. Ministers do, however, participate in some inward investment missions undertaken by the Welsh Development Agency. Those involving Ministers in 1996–97 and 1997–98 have resulted in the announcement of seven projects which promise the creation of 2,168 new jobs; 438 of those jobs have been created to date.

In addition, there was a visit to LG in Korea in July 1996 to announce the company's project for Wales and its associated 6,106 new jobs.

Green Belt

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when the next figures for the amount of Green Belt land in Wales will be published. [33478]

Mr. Win Griffiths: There are currently no Green Belts in Wales.

New Deal (Pilot Schemes)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the New Deal pilot schemes. [33530]

Mr. Hain: I am delighted to say that we have made good and rapid progress in implementing the New Deal for young people in the South-West Wales Pathfinder.

To date, well over 2,000 interviews with unemployed young people have been completed and almost 1,200 jobs pledged by more than 250 employers. A further 400 employers are expected to sign-up in the next three months.

This represents an excellent start to our crusade to bring hope to young jobless people and one which we will build-on when the New Deal is launched throughout Wales in April.

Concordats

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many draft concordats his Department is currently preparing; who they are intended to be with; and what are the issues and matters covered by them. [33839]

Mr. Ron Davies: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas) on 27 February 1998, Official Report, column 393. I anticipate that the National Assembly for Wales will need concordats with a number of Ministerial and non-ministerial departments, although it is too early to say how many.

Drafting of the concordats will take some months but, subject to the restrictions in the Government's White Paper on Freedom of Information, the drafts will be published as soon as they are finalised.

Official Secrets Act

Mr. Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales for what reasons elected members of the Welsh Assembly are to be subject to the Official Secrets Act. [33722]

Mr. Ron Davies: The Official Secrets Act 1989 makes it an offence for a Crown servant to make a damaging disclosure without authorisation of information relating to security and intelligence, defence, international relations, crime and special investigation powers of information entrusted in confidence to other states.

Clause 79 of the Government of Wales Bill seeks to apply the provisions of the 1989 Act, which apply to Ministers of the Crown (including Welsh Office Ministers) to those who will exercise corresponding functions within the National Assembly. Functions of the Assembly could be delegated to the Executive Committee, and also to subject committees. Clause 79 is drafted to enable those who exercise relevant functions to be in receipt of information subject to the Official Secrets Act on the same terms as Ministers are now.

Exchange Rates

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the value of export orders for goods and services lost by companies in Wales because of changes in exchange and interest rates since 1 May 1997 (a) in the current financial year and (b) in each of the next two financial years. [33619]

Mrs. Liddell: I have been asked to reply.

The economic effects of exchange rate and interest rate changes are difficult to isolate, especially at the regional level. Recent business surveys suggest that export orders in Wales have been hit by the strength of sterling, as in all other UK regions, but that output in the Welsh economy continues to expand.

MINISTER WITHOUT PORTFOLIO

Millennium Experience (Commercial Sponsors)

Mr. Maude: To ask the Minister without Portfolio what commercial sponsors of the Millennium Dome will receive in return for their money. [30513]

Mr. Mandelson: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on 9 March 1998, Official Report, column 59.

Millennium Experience (New Deal)

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister without Portfolio how many jobs will be made available to young people under the New Deal at the Millennium Experience. [31349]

Mr. Mandelson: The Millennium Experience at Greenwich is expected to create 2,000 new jobs during construction, and a further 5,000 during the life of the Experience. The New Millennium Experience Company will be co-operating fully with Greenwich council, other local authorities in the area, and all other appropriate agencies to optimise opportunities under the New Deal and other programmes aimed at increasing job opportunities for young people.

Millennium Experience (Churches)

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister without Portfolio if the Church of England will be required to pay for its exhibits in the Millennium Experience; and if other religions will be required to participate on the same basis. [31650]

Mr. Mandelson: The New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) is working closely with Christian churches and other faith communities through the Lambeth Group to ensure that the Dome's contents reflect the contribution of Christianity and other religions to society. The NMEC is considering a number of sponsorship approaches relating to the zone whose working title is "Spirit Level".

Smaller Millennium Dome

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Minister without Portfolio if he will make a statement on the contents of the smaller Millennium Dome; how it will be funded; and when the decision was taken to build it, and by whom. [31966]

Mr. Mandelson: A small theatre style building was part of the original proposal for which the New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) received planning permission in January 1997. The facility proposed by the NMEC has a seating capacity for between 5,000 and 6,000 people. It will be funded from within NMEC's existing budget. The NMEC are currently developing proposals for the events and activities to be held in the smaller Dome.

Millennium Experience (Camelot)

Mr. Maude: To ask the Minister without Portfolio when he began discussions with Camelot concerning possible sponsorship of the New Millennium Experience. [32232]

Mr. Mandelson: I have had no discussions with Camelot. The New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) is responsible for delivering the project, including achieving sponsorship. Camelot has been in discussion with the NMEC since the summer of 1997.

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Minister without Portfolio if he will make a statement on the role of Camelot as the distributor of tickets for the Millennium Experience. [32896]

Mr. Mandelson: The New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) announced, on 24 February, their agreement in principle with Camelot to be official distributor of Millennium Experience tickets. This would put a ticket outlet within three miles of 95 per cent. of the UK population. Precise details of Camelot's role and involvement is subject to further discussion and negotiation between them and the NMEC.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Civil Service (Disabled Employees)

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans he has to improve the opportunities for employment and career development of disabled people in the Civil Service. [33215]

Dr. David Clark: My Department has established a number of initiatives to improve opportunities for disabled staff in the Civil Service.

The Programme for Action to Achieve Equality of Opportunity for Disabled People in the Civil Service provides a framework to help departments and agencies to recruit, develop and promote people on merit regardless of whether they have a disability. It is complemented by a good practice guide, "Focus on Ability", which gives practical advice.

Progress made under the Programme for Action is monitored by my department and reported to Parliament in the biennial Progress Report on Equal Opportunities in the Civil Service.

Overall numbers of disabled staff in the Civil Service have risen. Action to increase the number of disabled staff at senior levels is being taken primarily through the implementation of the recommendations made by an independent Advisory Panel on Equal Opportunities in the Senior Civil Service.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Fishing Industry

Mr. Jack: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which EU member states have been given credit against their MAGP targets, affecting beam trawlers, for a reduction in the overall beam length. [32184]

Dr. John Cunningham: Footnote 4 to the table in Commission Decision 98/121/EC, approving the new MAGP IV objectives for the fishing fleet of the Netherlands, refers to compensation for a decrease in efficiency resulting from a reduction in beam length. I understand that this reflects the outcome of discussions between the Commission and the Netherlands about the Dutch MAGP III figures. Similar discussions took place about certain aspects of the UK MAGP III figures, which also resulted in adjustments in MAGP IV though these did not cover the question of beam length in our case. I am not aware of any other adjustments relating to beam length for any other Member State.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what will be the position of a fisherman who exhausts his effort allocation before he has caught his quota; and if he will make a statement. [32182]

Dr. John Cunningham: As the Parliamentary Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), has already made clear, the Government's preference is for controls on fishing effort to be managed by the industry itself, along the lines of existing quota management arrangements. Following discussions with industry representatives the available fishing effort in the pelagic and beam trawl segments has accordingly been allocated between the various producers' organisations (POs) and groups concerned. They have been invited to manage their uptake of effort to stay within these allocations on whatever basis they and their members consider appropriate. The Government are not seeking to impose any particular formula for this and are not making any allocations of effort to individual vessels. POs and groups will therefore have the flexibility to respond to local circumstances and, within their allocations, to take account of any special factors affecting particular members.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food under what legislative power he will impose effort targets on producer organisations. [32185]

Dr. John Cunningham: The legal obligation to reduce fishing effort by the UK fleet is contained in Commission Decision 98/124/EC which in turn is based on Council Decision 97/413/EC. As with management of catch quotas, the rules under which effort allocations have been made to producers' organisations are administrative and have been drawn up after full consultation with industry representatives. Any action to prevent further fishing by members of a producers' organisation which has exceeded its effort allocation will be taken by a licence variation under Section 4 of the Sea Fish Conservation Act 1967.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the means by which (a) Spain, (b) the Netherlands, (c) France, (d) Denmark and (e) Germany plan to achieve their MAGP IV objectives; if applications have been made to the European Union Commission for each of their schemes; what timespan the Commission has set for the implementation of each of the schemes; and if he will make a statement. [33038]

Mr. Morley: Under the terms of Council Decision 97/413/EC, all maritime Member States had until 30 June 1997 to submit to the European Commission national fishing effort limitation programmes for achieving the objectives fixed in MAGP IV, identifying and quantifying the means by which this is to be done. The Commission then had until 30 November 1997 to discuss these plans in detail with the Member States concerned and subsequently to approve them, with whatever modifications were found to be necessary.

In the event this process was not completed until 16 December 1997 and the resulting series of Commission Decisions was not published in the Official Journal of the European Communities until 12 February 1998. All 13 programmes are contained in volume L39 and all cover the period from 1 January 1997 to 31 December 2001.

Beef (Northern Ireland)

Mr. Jack: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the outstanding issues requiring resolution in order to satisfy (a) the Standing Veterinary Committee, (b) the Commission, (c) the Council of Ministers and (d) other bodies directly involved in the process of the lifting of the ban on Northern Ireland beef exports, to the extent that they will support a recommendation to approve the Northern Ireland Certified Herd-Scheme; and when he expects the matter to go before the Council of Ministers. [31910]

Dr. John Cunningham [holding answer 27 February 1998]: At the Standing Veterinary Committee on 4 March, ten member states supported the Commission's proposal for the Export Certified Herds Scheme. One member state abstained, pending further clarification of technical concerns, while supporting the principle of resuming exports under the arrangements laid down in the Florence Agreement. Four member states remain concerned about the controls governing eligibility for the scheme despite the fact that it had the Commission's full support. Because the proposal was not adopted by qualified majority, it has been referred to the Agriculture Council for a decision on 16–17 March.

Departmental Pay

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many people employed by (a) his Department and (b) the agencies for which his Department is responsible earn (i) less than £3.20 per hour, (ii) between £3.20 and £3.60 per hour, (iii) between £3.60 and £4 per hour and (iv) between £4 and £4.62 per hour. [30757]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 23 February 1998]: Staff in the Department are salaried and are not paid by the hour. However, I am able to provide a breakdown based on salary levels divided by normal full-time working hours of 36 hours per week in London or 37 hours elsewhere. This is set out in the table. The figures are based on 1997 salaries which took effect from 1 April.

	Core MAFF
(i) less than £3.20 per hour	0
(ii) between £3.20 and £3.60 per hour	430
(iii) between £3.60 and £4.00 per hour	332
(iv) between £4.00 and £4.62 per hour	400

I have asked the Chief Executives of the Department's Agencies to respond to the hon. Member direct.

Letter from Johnston McNeill to Mr. Alan Duncan, dated 10 March 1998:

As Chief Executive of the Meat Hygiene Service (MHS), your question to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food enquiring about the number of people employed at various hourly rates has been passed to me for reply with regard to this Executive Agency.

MHS staff are salaried and not paid by the hour. However I am able to provide date based on salary levels divided by normal full time working hours of 37 per week.

The MHS does not employ any persons at salary levels at less than £3.20 per hour; between £3.20 and £3.60 per hour or between £3.60 and £4.00 per hour.

7 people are employed at an hourly rate of between £4.00 and £4.62 an hour.

Letter from T. W. A. Little to Mr. Alan Duncan, dated 10 March 1998:

The Minister has asked me to reply to your question on hourly rates of pay within the Veterinary Laboratories Agency.

Staff at the VLA are salaried and are not paid by the hour. However, I am able to provide a breakdown based on the salary levels divided by normal working hours of 36 or 37 hours per week, depending on the location and grade of the staff. This is set out below. The figures are based on 1997 salaries which took effect from 1 April 1997.

	Number
(i) Less than £3.20 per hour	0
(ii) Between £3.20 and £3.60 per hour	0
(iii) Between £3.60 and £4.00 per hour	0
(iv) Between £4.00 and £4.62 per hour	107

Letter from P. W. Greig-Smith to Mr. Alan Duncan, dated 10 March 1998:

As Agency Chief Executive, I am responding to Mr Duncan's question to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food regarding hourly rates of pay for staff within the Centre for Environment, Fisheries and Aquaculture Science.

Staff within this Agency are salaried and are not paid by the hour. However, I am able to provide a breakdown based on salary levels divided by normal full-time working hours of 37 hours per week for all shore-based staff. This is set out below. The figures are based on 1997 salaries which took effect from 1 April.

The Marine staff on the Agency's research vessels are also included in the table but the breakdown is based on a full-time working week of 56 hours, which reflects the shift system in operation covering a seven day working week.

	Number
(i) less than £3.20 per hour	0
(ii) between £3.20 and £3.60 per hour	1
(iii) between £3.60 and £4.00 per hour	5
(iv) between £4.00 and £4.62 per hour	21

Letter from John Fitzgerald to Mr. Alan Duncan, dated 10 March 1998:

In my Chief Executive's absence, the Minister has asked me to reply to your question about hourly rates of pay for staff in the Veterinary Medicines Directorate (VMD) as this is an operational matter for which the Chief Executive is responsible.

Staff in the VMD are salaried and not paid by the hour. However, based on salary levels divided by normal full time working hours of 36 hours per week, I can confirm that none of VMD's staff is paid less than £4.00 per hour and 6 staff are paid between £4.00 and £4.62 per hour. These figures are based on 1997 salaries which took effect from 1 April 1997.

Letter from G. K. Bruce to Mr. Alan Duncan, dated 10 March 1998:

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has asked me to reply, in respect of the Pesticides Safety Directorate (PSD), to your question concerning the rates of pay for staff employed within the Agency.

The information you requested is as follows:

	Number of staff
(i) Less than £3.20 per hour	0
(ii) Between £3.20 and £3.60 per hour	6
(iii) Between £3.60 and £4.00 per hour	2
(iv) Between £4.00 and £4.62 per hour	6

Letter from P. I. Stanley to Mr. Alan Duncan, dated 10 March 1998:

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has asked me to reply, in respect of the Central Science Laboratory (CSL), to your question concerning hourly rates of pay for employees.

Staff in CSL are salaried and are not paid by the hour. However, I am able to provide information based on salary levels divided by the normal full-time working hours of 37 per week and this is set out in the table below.

Rate of pay	Number of employees
Less than £3.20 per hour	0
Between £3.20 and £3.60 per hour	0
Between £3.60 and £4.00 per hour	1
Between £4.00 and £4.62 per hour	6

These figures are based on salaries which took effect from 1 August 1997.

Letter from Michael Finnigan to Mr. Alan Duncan, dated 10 March 1998:

The Minister has asked me to reply to your question about the hourly rate of earnings within the Farming and Rural Conservation Agency (FRCA).

Staff in FRCA are salaried and not paid by the hour. Set out below is a breakdown based on salary levels divided by normal full-time working hours of 36 hours per week in London, or 37 hours elsewhere. The figures are based on 1997 salaries which took effect from 1 April.

	FRCA
(i) less than £3.20 per hour	0
(ii) between £3.20 and £3.60 per hour	0
(iii) between £3.60 and £4.00 per hour	1
(iv) between £4.00 and £4.62 per hour	8

Animal Health Products (Germany)

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the use in Germany of animal health products banned in the United Kingdom. [33007]

Mr. Rooker: Such assessment is a matter for the Member State concerned.

Farmers

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the number of (a) dairy farmers and (b) general livestock farmers who will be in business in 2003; and what are the current figures. [33000]

Mr. Rooker: No. It would not be possible to derive such estimates without making a large number of assumptions. Restructuring of the agriculture industry is a continuous process. Currently, there are about 30,000 agricultural holdings in the United Kingdom classified as dairying and about 90,000 classified as cattle and sheep holdings. These do not include holdings where dairy herds or cattle and sheep are not the main enterprise.

Veterinary Medicines (Adverse Reactions)

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made on moving the responsibility for the monitoring and subsequent investigation of human suspected adverse reactions to veterinary medicines from the Veterinary Medicines Directorate to an independent research institute or university department. [32850]

Mr. Rooker: This recommendation of the Agriculture Committee was carefully reviewed by a Group convened by Professor D. H. Lawson, Chairman of the Medicines Commission. The Group concluded in November 1996 that it could not identify any independent body capable of taking over the Suspected Adverse Reactions Surveillance Scheme (SARSS). However the Group made a number of recommendations designed to improve public confidence in the objectivity of the Scheme's administration, including the reconstruction of the SARSS Appraisal Panel with an exclusively independent membership, all of which were accepted by the Government.

Imported Oxheads

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the safety of importing oxheads for use in (a) patés and (b) other foods. [33003]

Mr. Rooker: The Specified Risk Material Order 1997, which came into force on 1 January, prohibits the importation of ox-heads from animals more than 12 months of age (except those born, reared and slaughtered in Australia or New Zealand) for use in any food or animal feed because they contain Specified Risk Material as defined in Commission Decision 97/534/EC.

Meat Imports

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what charges are made to importers of meat products to cover the expenses of health and hygiene inspections; and what assessment he has made of the impact of these charges on competition in the United Kingdom market between domestic and imported products. [33002]

Mr. Rooker: Council Directive 85/73/EEC, as amended, lays down minimum fees for veterinary checks at Border Inspection Posts (BIPs) on fresh meat and meat products imported into the Community from third countries. At present, for imports from all countries other than New Zealand, the minimum fee is 5 ECU a tonne and 30 ECU per consignment. The real costs of inspections are charged to importers, by the local authorities responsible for the BIPs, where these exceed the minimum fee. For New Zealand, in accordance with the Veterinary Equivalence Agreement between the EC and New Zealand, standard fees of 1.5 ECU a tonne and 30 ECU per consignment apply.

Directive 85/73/EEC also requires Member States to recover the costs of those hygiene inspections conducted at licensed fresh meat premises in accordance with harmonised EC meat hygiene rules. The Directive lays down standard charges (in ECUs) for hygiene inspections of red meat, poultry meat and game meat. Where the actual costs of inspection exceeds the standard charge, the Directive provides for actual costs to be charged. Thus both imported and domestically produced fresh meat is subject to hygiene inspection to ensure compliance with EC rules before being placed on the market, for which a harmonised fee is charged, in accordance with Directive 85/73/EEC.

Animal Food Products (South America)

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the risk of infection with E.coli in imported animal food products from South America. [33001]

Mr. Rooker: The Government are not aware of any evidence that implicates animal food products from South America in incidents of E.coli poisoning in the UK.

Dietary Supplements

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many and what proportion of representations from (a) hon. Members and (b) others on his proposed vitamin B6 regulations were in favour of the proposals since July 1997. [33517]

Mr. Rooker: The regulations required to introduce the proposed controls on dietary supplements containing vitamin B6 have yet to be issued for consultation. However, the Government have received a large number of unsolicited representations since they announced in July their intention to make legislation to implement the recommendations of its advisory committees. No record has been kept of the number of representations which have either favoured or opposed the proposed controls.

Bovine Tuberculosis

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) when he will issue guidelines on badger management in relation to areas where the Krebs experiment takes the form of such management; and if he will consult before implementing the guidelines; [33726]

(2) if it will be his policy to apply the Krebs experiment in all appropriate areas which suffer a high level of bovine TB incidence over a long period; [33734]

(3) what policy he will adopt in areas where the experiment takes the form of extermination (a) to ensure that the areas selected for the Krebs experiments are sufficiently isolated from their surroundings and (b) to ensure that the defined areas are sufficiently homogeneous, in the absence of a power to force landowners to exterminate badgers. [33736]

Mr. Rooker: It is important that the culling experiment recommended in the Krebs report on TB in Cattle and Badgers is capable of providing scientifically robust conclusions. Decisions on the timing and conduct of the experiment will not be reached until we have advice from the Expert Group set up in February under the chairmanship of Professor Bourne to advise on these issues.

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to consult farmers' representatives in relation to management practices at the point of a TB breakdown. [33732]

Mr. Rooker: The Krebs report makes some important recommendations on management practices. I shall certainly be discussing implementation of these and other aspects of the report with farmers' representatives once we have made a preliminary assessment of all the responses to the consultation exercise on the report.

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what forecast he has made of the PSBR costs of bovine TB at the present rate of increase in bovine TB incidence over the next 10 years. [33735]

Mr. Rooker: Departmental provision, including for bovine TB, for 1999–2000 and beyond is under review as part of the Comprehensive Spending Review. The costs of the TB control programme are potentially affected by a number of factors, including the EU legislative provisions governing TB testing which are currently under discussion in Brussels, and the incidence of the disease.

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food under what powers he will implement the Krebs recommendations. [33725]

Mr. Rooker: We shall announce how we propose to take forward implementation of the recommendations in the Krebs report once we have fully considered the responses to the public consultation on the report and in the light of advice from the Expert Group.

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will offer the 125 per cent. compensation rate applied in the Woodchester Park experiments to all farmers with cases of bovine TB in areas where the Krebs experiment takes the form of total protection of badgers. [33733]

Mr. Rooker: We see no grounds for asking taxpayers to meet a larger share of farmers' losses. We are assessing the implications of implementation of the Krebs report for the enhanced compensation arrangements which currently apply at Woodchester Park (100 per cent. of either the animal's market value or 125 per cent. of the average monthly market price two months before valuation, whichever is less, plus consequential losses).

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will implement Professor Kreb's recommendation that independent research should be conducted into (a) a definitive live animal test for bovine TB, (b) vaccines and (c) DNA-typing of badger latrines to identify whether badger setts are infected; what his timetable for such implementation will be; and what plans he has to institute a profit levy on manufacturers in the event that exchequer-funded experiments in these areas are successful. [33731]

Mr. Rooker: We are currently considering our TB research requirements in the light of the Krebs recommendations. We intend to publish a research requirements document in early April. This approach to commissioning research represents a significant move in the direction of open competition to ensure research is conducted by groups with the best expertise. However, elements of the programme that require particular facilities and expertise may be placed directly with commissioned contractors.

We would usually arrange to share with researchers any royalty revenue stream in the event of any commercially exploitable Intellectual Property (IP) arising from a project.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Departmental Pay

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people employed by (a) his Department, (b) the agencies for which his Department is responsible, (c) schools, (d) colleges and (e) universities earn (i) less than £3.20 per hour, (ii) between £3.20 and £3.60 per hour, (iii) between £3.60 and £4 per hour and (iv) between £4 and £4.62 per hour. [30745]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 23 February 1998]: The number of permanent staff in the Department for Education and Employment currently earning:

less than £3.20 per hour is 0

between £3.20 and £3.60 per hour is 83

between £3.60 and £4 per hour is 20

between £4 and £4.62 per hour is 264.

The other information requested for schools, colleges and universities can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Car Parking

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has (a) to reduce the number of car parking spaces available for use by staff and (b) to introduce charges for staff using workplace car parking spaces. [32453]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 3 March 1998]: In line with the Guide to Green Transport Plans circulated last September by the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson), DfEE will actively consider this issue in preparing Green Transport Plans for its key buildings.

Mathematics Teachers

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many mathematics teachers in secondary schools were teaching the subject in each of the last three secondary staffing surveys. [33832]

Ms Estelle Morris: Estimates of full-time teachers in secondary schools who held a qualification in mathematics and were teaching mathematics are given in the table:

Year of survey	Number of teachers[1]
1988	22,000
1992	21,000
1996[2]	20,000

[1] In addition there were some 4,000 teachers in secondary schools in 1988 and 2,000 in 1992 who held a qualification with mathematics as a subsidiary subject and were teaching mathematics.

[2] In 1996 no distinction was made between main and subsidiary subjects of qualifications, and only up to three subjects per qualification were collected compared with up to four subjects in 1988 and 1992.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many mathematics teachers there were in each of the last three staffing surveys whose highest qualification in mathematics was (a) a specialist degree or higher qualification in mathematics, (b) a degree in a related subject, (c) a PGCE or other certificate and (d) an Education degree. [33837]

Ms Estelle Morris: Estimates of full-time teachers in secondary schools with a qualification in mathematics are given in the table:

	Highest qualification[1]
Year of Survey	Degree	BEd	PGCE/Cert Ed
1988	11,000	3,000	10,000
1992	11,000	3,000	11,000
1996[2]	13,000	5,000	9,000

[1] In addition there were some 2,000 teachers in 1988 and 1992 who held other qualifications with mathematics as a main subject, and 16,000 in 1988 and 11,000 in 1992 who held a qualification with mathematics as a subsidiary subject.
[2] In 1996 no distinction was made between main and subsidiary subjects of qualifications, and only up to three subjects per qualification were collected compared with up to four subjects in 1988 and 1992. In 1996 there were 1,000 teachers who held other qualifications in mathematics.

Class Sizes

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the LEAs who bid for money to reduce the size of classes at KS1 and had their bids (a) turned down and (b) reduced, indicating in each case the number of KS1 pupils in the authority's schools and the original amount of the bid. [33834]

Mr. Byers: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 4 March 1998, Official Report, column 677.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the size of the original bid by the Funding Agency for Schools to reduce KS1 classes; and to what extent it was scaled down. [33833]

Mr. Byers: Of the £22 million available to reduce infant class sizes in 1998–99, £680,000 was allocated to the Funding Agency for Schools pro rata on the basis of pupil numbers in GM primary schools. No specific bidding or applications process was involved.

School Sizes

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many (a) infant, (b) junior and (c) primary schools there were with (i) less than 50 pupils and (ii) less than 100 pupils in September 1997. [33723]

Mr. Byers: Information on pupils in primary schools in September is not collected centrally.

Teachers (Qualifications)

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many teachers working in primary schools do not have GCSE grade 'C' or equivalent in English and mathematics. [33724]

Ms Estelle Morris: This information is not held centrally.

Rural Primary School Teachers

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if the grade of Advanced Skills Teacher is available to teachers working in rural primary schools. [33840]

Mr. Byers: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is still consulting on his proposals to introduce a new grade of Advanced Skills Teacher. We do not intend that there should be any legal impediment to Advanced Skills Teacher posts being established in any school, or to prevent teachers working in rural primary schools from applying for such posts.

New Deal (Coventry)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the number of jobs for sick and disabled people which will be created by the New Deal scheme in Coventry. [33648]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The aim of the New Deal for Disabled People is not specifically to create jobs but to explore a range of approaches to identify the most effective ways of helping disabled people and those with long-term health problems to move into work, and to avoid becoming dependent on long-term incapacity benefits in the first place. Until the results of the first year pilots are available it would not be sensible to predict the likely numbers of those who will secure work through this approach either nationally or in a particular locality such as Coventry.

European Union

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if his Department approved the contents of "What Exactly is Europe? A Classroom Guide to the European Union"; and how many copies have been distributed in the United Kingdom. [32976]

Mr. Doug Henderson: I have been asked to reply.

No. The booklet was produced by the Commission Representation in London. They asked British teachers to write it and then sent samples to headteachers. Around 134,000 copies have since been distributed to schools.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Power Generators

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she has seen a copy of the signed agreement reached by the Paymaster General with the power generators. [26412]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 30 January 1998]: No agreement was reached between the power generators and the Government. Arrangements for coal deliveries were agreed by the relevant parties.

Coal Purchases

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment she has made of the effect of the recent mild weather on (a) future purchases of coal by the generators and (b) the timing of deliveries of coal to the generators. [32691]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 3 March 1998]: The volumes of coal purchased by the generators and the timing of deliveries are governed by the contracts between the generators and their various coal suppliers. The volume of coal actually burnt is, in part, influenced by the weather and variations against planned levels of burn may be reflected in the level of coal stocks held by the generators. The relationship between the weather and stock levels is not straightforward. Stock levels have fallen in recent months despite the mild weather.

PA Consulting Group

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many contracts her Department has placed with PA Consulting Group since 1979; and what has been the aggregate value of these contracts. [33488]

Mrs. Beckett: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Pharmaceuticals

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment her Department has made of the comparative price of over-the-counter medicines in (a) the UK and (b) the rest of the EU. [33464]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Wimbledon (Mr. Casale) on 11 February 1998, Official Report, column 217.

Inward Investment

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the level of inward investment into Britain in the last quarter of (a) 1997 and (b) 1996. [33297]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 6 March 1998]: I refer the right hon. Member to my answer to him on 16 February 1998, Official Report, columns 510–11. Information for the fourth quarter of 1997 will be published by the Office for National Statistics (ONS) on 20 March 1998.

Gas-fired Power Stations

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what advice the Government have received concerning the legality of a moratorium on new gas-fired power stations. [33298]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 5 March 1998]: I am satisfied that the arrangements for the handling of applications in relation to new power stations set out in my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. King) of 22 December 1997, Official Report, columns 519–20, are legally sound.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade in what circumstances the Government would consider an application for a new gas-fired power station before the conclusion of her review of energy sources for power generation. [33299]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 6 March 1998]: Our general approach is to defer decisions on power station applications until the work of the Review has been completed. I have said I would be prepared to consider, on their merits, reasoned requests for exceptions to be made in particular cases. In this context, I have also said I would be mindful of the environmental and other benefits of combined heat and power. I have indicated that such requests should be made in writing.

Industrial Tribunals

Dr. Kumar: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what arrangements she will make for the appointment of new lay members to the industrial tribunals. [34109]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Government wish to review the recruitment and appointments procedures for industrial tribunal lay members to encourage the appointment of lay members from a wide variety of backgrounds, and to ensure that they are in line with the guidance of the Commissioner of Public Appointments. It is important that all users of tribunals have confidence in the lay members appointed to the tribunals and we therefore intend to consult the social partners and other interested parties on the review. We propose to make the next appointments of new lay members to the industrial tribunals in October 1999.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Officials (Entry Warrants)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many of her officials are authorised to enter premises without a warrant. [29045]

Mr. Keith Bradley: There are no circumstances in which officials of this Department, in the course of their duties, are authorised to enter any premises without a warrant unless invited to do so by the owner or occupier.

Benefit Entitlement

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what savings would be made by withdrawing entitlement to (a) the state pension, (b) maternity pay and (c) disability living allowance from (i) households and (ii) individuals with gross income in excess of (1) £1,000,000 per annum, (2) £500,000 per annum, (3) £100,000 per annum, (4) £50,000 per annum, (5) £40,000 per annum and (6) £30,000 per annum. [23353]

Mr. Denham: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is set out in the tables.

Estimated savings from withdrawing entitlement to basic retirement pension from those (i) benefit units (ii) individuals with gross income in excess of given thresholds: 1997–98

£ million

Basic state retirement pension	Total gross income in excess of: £30,000 p.a.	£40,000 p.a.	£50,000 p.a.[1]
(i) Benefit unit income	1,200	600	350
(ii) Individual income	450	250	150

Notes:

1. Results rounded to nearest £50 million.
2. Retirement Pension is a taxable benefit; as such removal of entitlement will lead to a fall in tax revenues. This effect is not allowed for in the above table.
3. No adjustment is made for any effects of the loss of RP on entitlement to other benefits.
4. Total gross income includes the Retirement Pension.
5. The Family Resources Survey is based on a sample of private households—the above estimates assume that recipients in residential care share the income characteristics of those in private households.
6. A "benefit unit" is a single adult or a couple, together with any dependent children. (Adults living in the same household as their parent(s) are each classified as separate benefit units, and are assessed separately for Income Support or Family Credit)

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many households are in receipt of housing benefit for (a) local authority homes, (b) private rented homes and (c) housing association homes. [28803]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The information is set out in the table.

Housing benefit recipients—Great Britain—August 1997

Child Support

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average length of time between the Child Support Agency receiving an application and a maintenance award being made (a) in all cases and (b) in cases where the absent parent is an absent parent to more than one parent with care. [28596]

Mr. Keith Bradley: Information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is as follows.

We are looking for substantial and sustained operational improvements from the Child Support Agency, in particular on getting more maintenance paid, reducing the backlog and improving customer service.

The Child Support Agency aims to clear 60 per cent. of new maintenance applications within 26 weeks of receipt. In the current year, performance has been affected by the clearance of a substantial number of older cases. Nevertheless, in the months from April to the end of December 1997, 72 per cent. of maintenance applications were cleared within 26 weeks. A special exercise carried out by Departmental statisticians indicated that, including cases from the backlog, the median clearance time for those that resulted in a maintenance assessment for the three months ending 30 November 1997 was 37 weeks. Currently, around a third of all applications cleared by the Agency result in a maintenance assessment.

Average clearance times are not available for cases where a non-resident parent has more than one parent with care.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if, in a case where two parents with care make application to the Child Support Agency, with respect to the same absent parent, the first parent with care is given priority over the second; [28598]

(2) what measures she proposes to take in cases where the absent parent is an absent parent to more than one parent with care, and when the second parent with care makes application to the CSA before the first parent with care's application is processed. [28597]

Mr. Keith Bradley: Where there are two or more parents with care in respect of the same absent parent, applications for maintenance are normally dealt with in the order they are received. The non-resident parent's liability to pay maintenance for his children is then shared out between the parents with care based on their respective maintenance requirements.

Child support regulations that came into effect on 5 August 1996 cater for maintenance applications being processed other than in the normal order. However applications from more than one parent with care for maintenance from the same non-resident parent which were received before 5 August 1996 are not covered by these regulations. Procedures have now been developed for handling such applications.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many child support appeal tribunal hearings have been held in each quarter to date; in what percentage of cases the CSO's decision was upheld; how many cases are awaiting a hearing; and what is the average time from the letter of appeal being received to a tribunal decision being made. [30056]

Mr. Keith Bradley [holding answer 18 February 1998]: The operation of the appeals system is a matter for the Independent Tribunal Service (ITS). The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Quarter	Appeals heard	Percentage of Child Support Officer's decisions upheld[1]	Cases awaiting hearing	Average clearance time (weeks)
October to December 1993	22	50	586	n/a
January to March 1994	58	55.1	1,694	n/a

April to June 1996	1,845	15.3	3,734	36.32
July to September 1996	1,511	14.8	3,815	32.40
October to December 1996	1,559	16.5	3,957	30.46
January to March 1997	1,741	17.9	3,904	27.48
April to June 1997	1,865	18.8	3,875	27.79
July to September 1997	2,345	22.8	4,037	25.36

[1] The percentage figures are calculated by including all cases cleared at hearing, adjourned and postponed.

Notes:

1. There was a total of 16,778 appeals heard between 1 October 1993 and 30 September 1997. During the same four year period the Child Support Agency cleared 1,786,271 maintenance applications.
2. Appeals where Child Support Officer's decisions were not upheld include all of those cases where the tribunal overturned any part of the Child Support Officer's decision, whether or not this was the subject of the appeal.

Pensions

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) current and (b) future pensioners own personal pension plans. [28476]

Mr. Denham: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available using data drawn from the 1995 General Household Survey and Office of National Statistics population estimates is that in 1995 around 8.8 million individuals of working age had owned a personal pension plan.

The Lifetime Labour Market Database (based on 1 per cent. sample of National Insurance records) estimates that, at the end of the financial year 1995–96, 5,499,000[1] individuals of working age owned appropriate personal pension plans.

Note:

[1] This figure has been rounded to the nearest 1,000.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the effect in (a) gross pensions expenditure, (b) income-related benefits expenditure and (c) income tax revenues, of relaxing contribution rules so that all adults over state pension age were to be immediately entitled to a full basic state pension in their own right. [31033]

Mr. Denham: The information is set out in the table.

£ billion

GB 1998–99	Costs (+) / Savings (–)
Additional RP cost	6.2
Offsets for other benefits paid to those over state pension age	–0.8
Income-related benefit offset	–1.2
Income tax offset	–0.3
Total net cost	3.9

Notes:
1. The costs/savings are in 1998–99 prices and are rounded to the nearest £0.1 billion.
2. Estimates of the gross cost are provided by the Government Actuary's Department.
3. The estimate of the change in income tax revenue, provided by the Inland Revenue, uses a projection of the 1995–96 Family Expenditure Survey.
4. Means-tested benefit offsets were calculated using the 1995–96 Family Resources Survey and the May 1996 Income Support Quarterly Statistical Enquiry, both uprated to 1997–98 prices, benefits and earnings levels, and calibrated to the forecasts underlying the 1997 Departmental Report.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will make it her policy to phase out SERPs by closing it off to new entrants. [32974]

Mr. Denham: The Government are committed to retaining SERPS as an option for those who wish to remain in it. All representations on the future of SERPS are being considered as part of the Pensions Review.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations she has received regarding the advantages of pension contributions being made on a voluntary basis. [32876]

Mr. Denham: Contributions to the State pension scheme including the State Earnings Related Pension Scheme or a contracted out second pension are compulsory for most people in employment. As part of the public consultation exercise of the Pensions Review, we received a number of representations proposing that contributions to private second pensions, that is, over and above the contracted out element, should remain voluntary and not compulsory. We are currently considering all of the representations we have received.

The Government's starting point is the need to secure better value from the contributions which people make to pensions and to make the best use of the money already in the system, whether this comes directly from individuals and employers, or indirectly from them through the NI system.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Wills: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what research her Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into the health of incapacity benefit claimants; [29780]

(2) what records her Department maintains in respect of incapacity benefit claimants by reference to (a) the type of illness or disability of the claimant and (b) the type of functional incapacity on which their claim is based, other than those set out in the 1997 Social Security Statistics. [29779]

Mr. Denham: We routinely collect information on the medical conditions suffered by Incapacity Benefit claimants and these are summarised in the "Incapacity Benefit and Severe Disablement Allowance Quarterly Summary of Statistics", copies of which are available in the Library. In addition, information on the health and functional capacity of former Incapacity Benefit recipients will be available in the survey of those no longer receiving Incapacity Benefit due to be published in the Summer in the Department's Research Report Series.

Lone Parents

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many lone parents in Wales who claim (a) income support and (b) housing benefit will have a lower level of income compared to present claimants after April as a result of the abolition of lone parent premium; [29990]

(2) what estimate she has made of the number of lone parents in Wales whose income will be reduced because of proposed changes to lone parent benefit; [29959]

(3) how many lone parents in Wales who claim council tax benefit after April will lose income as a result of the abolition of the lone parent premium. [29991]

Mr. Keith Bradley: Existing recipients of the lone parent rate of child benefit and family premium will be protected. There will be no cash losers. At the end of 1998/99, it is estimated that the number of lone parents making new claims in Wales who will receive the same rate as couples with children as a result of the measure to remove entitlement to the lone parent rate of family premium (from April 1998) and child benefit (from June 1998), will be around 14,000 in Income Support; 3,000 in Housing Benefit; 2,000 in Council Tax Benefit and 4,000 in Child Benefit.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will list for each OECD member state the age of the youngest child at which under social security regulations the lone parent concerned with the child's upbringing is required to seek work. [33631]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is set out in the table.

The requirement-to-seek-work rules for lone parents in relation to the age of their youngest child as a condition for the receipt of social assistance benefits for those OECD countries

Country
OECD Country	Requirement for lone parents to seek work as a condition for receipt of income-tested benefits
Austria	Requirement to seek work when youngest child is aged 3
Belgium	Discretionary
Denmark	Lone parents subject to same rules as apply to all other claimants (subject to availability of child care)
Finland	Requirement to seek work when youngest child is aged 3

The requirement-to-seek-work rules for lone parents in relation to the age of their youngest child as a condition for the receipt of social assistance benefits for those OECD countries

Country
France	Lone parents may receive an income-related benefit Allocations de parents isolé (API) for one year, but are expected to take paid work once the youngest child is 3 years old—if they do not, they can claim income-related Revenu Minimum d'Insertion (RMI) which is payable at a lower rate
Germany	Lone parents must be available for part-time work when the youngest child reaches nursery school age and for full time work when the child reaches 14 years
Greece	None
Iceland	None
Ireland	Requirement to seek work when youngest child is aged 16
Italy	Discretionary
Luxembourg	Requirement to seek work when youngest child aged 6. Law on RMG (income support) to be tightened so that parents with children over 2 will only receive benefit if there is no suitable job available
Netherlands	Requirement to seek work when youngest child aged 5 (age 12 before 1994)
Norway	Requirement to seek work when youngest child aged 10
Portugal	No social assistance benefits for lone parents
Spain	Discretionary
Sweden	Requirement to seek work for all. Municipalities obliged to provide daycare for children aged between 1 and 12
Switzerland	Discretionary within individual cantons
UK	Requirement to seek work when youngest child is aged 16
Australia	Requirement to seek work when youngest child is aged 16
Canada	Requirement differs in each Province/Territory. In some, requirement to seek work when youngest child is aged 12. In others, it is when youngest child is 6 months old
Japan	No special requirements
New Zealand	Requirement to seek work when youngest child aged 16
United States	Federal guidelines are: Aid to Families with Dependent Children—requirement to seek work when youngest aged 4 Food stamps—requirement to seek work when youngest child aged 6 Different states vary the requirement to seek work[1]

[1] In August 1996, President Clinton signed the Welfare Reform Bill giving States considerable power to create their own welfare programmes. The transfer of responsibility from the Federal Government to individual States for the design of welfare systems has created variations in the implementation of these Federal guidelines among States. For example, in the state of Wisconsin long parents are expected to satisfy the work requirement once their youngest child reaches 12 weeks old.

1. Information about the social assistance schemes or requirement-to-work rules for lone parents in the other OECD countries, namely the Czech Republic, Hungary, Korea, Mexico, Poland and Turkey, is not available.

2. Information about whether the requirements contained in the table are laid down in the social security legislation of the countries concerned or whether they are applied administratively is not available.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment she has made of possible disincentives to work resulting from abandonment of the lone parent rate of child benefit. [32871]

Mr. Keith Bradley: Steps have been taken to protect work incentives for existing lone parents. Existing recipients will continue to receive the higher rate of Child Benefit and lone parents will be able to claim the higher rate of Child Benefit when they leave Income Support for work. Independent research suggests that the average additional income for lone parents already in work and on Family Credit is over £50 a week above the estimate of their out-of-work income.

The Government are addressing the real barriers to work with the New Deal for Lone Parents, improvements to the child care disregard in the in-work benefits, the National Child Care Strategy and the Working Families Tax Credit.

Benefits Take-up

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to her answer of 24 February 1998, Official Report, column 209, on the take-up of benefits, if she will list take-up rates of each benefit by benefit area office. [32238]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The information requested is not available.

War Pensions

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what plans she has to review the criteria for assessing entitlement to war pensioners' mobility supplement and constant attendance allowance for war disablement pensioners suffering from post-viral fatigue syndrome; [30242]

(2) what percentage of Gulf War veterans awarded war disablement pensions due to post-viral fatigue syndrome have (a) applied for war pensions' mobility supplement and constant attendance allowance and (b) been awarded these benefits since 1992; [30241]

(3) what medical guidance her Department has given to the War Pensions Agency in respect of the condition post-viral fatigue syndrome for assessing entitlement to (i) war disablement pensions, (ii) war pensioners' mobility supplement and (iii) constant attendance allowance. [30243]

Mr. Denham: The Government fully recognise the considerable debt of gratitude owed to all those who have been disabled as a result of service in the Armed Forces.

Under the Naval, Military and Air Forces Etc. (Disablement and Death) Service Pensions Order 1983, a war pension may be awarded for any disablement due to, or aggravated by, any service in the armed forces of the Crown. Awards are not made for a prescribed list of diagnoses or conditions but rather cases are considered on their individual merits within the relevant law. The Scheme includes a range of supplementary allowances aimed at those most seriously disabled. Where any disablement assessed at not less than 40 per cent. is such as to render the war pensioner unable to walk or restricts severely his ability to do so, an award of Mobility Supplement may be made. Similarly, where the war pensioner's disablement is assessed at not less than 80 per cent. and is such that personal attendance on him is necessary, an award of Constant Attendance Allowance may be awarded.

By 31 January 1998, 1,938 claims for a War Disablement Pension had been received from Gulf War veterans. So far 1,301 awards have been made in respect of a wide variety of conditions but only one has been made in respect of post viral fatigue syndrome. A claim for War Pensions' Mobility Supplement and Constant Attendance Allowance was rejected as not meeting the criteria for an award.

No medical guidance on entitlement or eligibility for War Disablement Pension, War Pensioners' Mobility Supplement or Constant Attendance Allowance specific to the diagnosis post viral fatigue syndrome has been issued to War Pensions Agency medical advisers. Guidance is, however, available on chronic fatigue syndrome of which post viral fatigue syndrome is a recognised variant. The diagnosis chronic fatigue syndrome is used where certain defined diagnostic criteria known as the Fukuda criteria are met. Medical advisers are trained to consider any disablement, physical or mental and to make decisions on the facts of the individual case and within the relevant law on entitlement and all other war pensions issues.

There are no plans to review the criteria for assessing War Pensions' Mobility Supplement or Constant Attendance Allowance for war pensioners suffering from post viral fatigue syndrome.

Tribunals

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans the Government have to ensure that people appealing against decisions to reduce or withdraw benefit entitlement have access to free advice and representation at independent tribunal hearings. [31083]

Mr. Keith Bradley: People who appeal against decisions to reduce or withdraw benefit entitlement already have access to free advice and representation at tribunal hearings, through various welfare organisations and Citizens Advice Bureaux. Most advice agencies which offer free tribunal representation are funded by local authorities, by Department of Health section 64 grants or by a combination of the two.

The appeals leaflet, NI 246, which is attached to the appeal form, provides information about the options open to appellants for obtaining advice. Some people may receive advice from a solicitor through the Legal Advice and Assistance scheme.

There are no plans at present to extend the scope of legal aid to allow representation before tribunals.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many meetings have been requested with her Department's Ministers by (a) Labour and (b) Conservative hon. Members; and how many meetings have been granted in each category. [31300]

Ms Harman: My Ministerial colleagues and I meet a number of hon. Members from both sides of the House during the course of our business.

All Work Test

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people have been subject to the all work test (a) in Birmingham, (b) in the West Midlands and (c) nationally; what percentage failed the test; how many of those failing the test appealed; how many of the appeals were oral hearings; and what was the success rate for (i) hearings held orally and (ii) other appeals. [31272]

Mr. Denham: The information is not available in the form requested. Such information as is available is set out in the table.

April 1995 to 30 September 1997 inclusive	Birmingham	West Midlands	National
Number who have been subject to the All Work Test (AWT)	57,028	182,552	2,899,127
Number who have failed the AWT	9,922	26,333	415,957
Percentage AWT failure rate	17	14	14

Since its introduction in April 1995, the number of people who have appealed against the All Work Test is 11,294 in West Midlands region and 101,559 nationally.

Of the 8,238 appeals heard and decided in the West Midlands region, 3,791 were in the appellant's favour. Nationally, the figure was 78,402 of which 35,873 were in appellant's favour.

The percentage of appeals decided in the appellant's favour was 46 per cent. for West Midlands and 45.8 per cent. nationally.

Vaccine Damage Payments

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what provisions the Government intend to make to provide compensation to those who have suffered severe brain damage as a result of vaccination administered on behalf of the Department of Health. [30827]

Mr. Denham: The existing Vaccine Damage Payment scheme, which has been in place since 1979, provides a one-off payment, not compensation, to people severely disabled by vaccination against certain diseases. The Vaccine Damage Payments Act and Regulations set out the full conditions of entitlement. The scheme is currently under consideration.

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applications were made under the Vaccine Damage Payments Act 1979 in each year since 1993; and of these applications, how many were successful and which vaccines were involved. [30805]

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many payments have been made to applicants following assessment by the Vaccine Damage Payments Unit since its inception, by type of vaccine. [30939]

Mr. Denham: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is set out in the table.

Notes:

1. Applicants are asked to list all the vaccines they or their child have received. The award is not made in respect of a specific vaccine, as children receive several vaccines in the first few months of life.
2. The payments made in any one year do not necessarily relate to the specific claims made in that year. Also, if an award is made, a trust fund may need to be set up to administer the money on behalf of the disabled person.

Contributions Records

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will list, in relation to those seeking amendments to their pre-1988 contributions records so as to reduce or cancel those records by determination under section 17 of the Social Security Administration Act 1992, how many applications for determination have been (a) made, (b) withdrawn and (c) determined; of (c), how many were (i) successful and (ii) unsuccessful; and of (a), (b) and (c) what was the average, lowest and highest cost of administering the determination process in the last five years. [31463]

Mr. Denham: A total of 35 applications for determination under section 17 of the Social Security Administration Act 1992 have been made by people seeking to have their record of pre-1988 contributions reduced or cancelled. One of these applications was subsequently withdrawn by the applicant and none of the determinations made in the other 34 cases resulted in any changes to the applicants' contribution records.

Information about the costs of administering the determination process in individual cases is not available, but the average cost of all determinations made by the Office for the Determination of Contributions Questions is estimated to be in the region of £750.

New Deal

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many jobs she intends to make available in her Department under the New Deal. [31348]

Mr. Keith Bradley: This Department intends to play a full part in offering jobs under the New Deal and is currently considering arrangements for recruitment and training and the numbers of jobs we could offer.

Family Credit

Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the new procedural instructions dealing with review procedures within the family credit unit were implemented; who issued the instructions; and what arrangements are in place to ensure that the Family Credit Customer Services are informed of them. [31952]

Mr. Keith Bradley: On 7 April 1997, changes were introduced in the Social Security system which simplified and aligned rules on the backdating of claims to benefits and reviews of benefit.

Information about the changes and new procedural instructions for Family Credit staff were issued by the Family Credit Adjudication Liaison Section. Instructions were issued to all staff (adjudication officers and above) at the Family Credit Unit, including staff in the Customer Services section.

Computerisation

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what progress her Department is making with the introduction of the computerised social security benefits system in post offices; [32003]

(2) what is the target date for all post offices to be connected to the computerised social security system; [32005]

(3) how many post offices she plans to be connected to the computerised social security system in the next 12 months; and how many are currently connected; [32004]

(4) what assessment she has made of the service provided by ICL to introduce the computerised social security system into post offices. [32006]

Mr. Denham: There are currently 205 post offices in the South West and North East of England paying child benefit by payment card as part of a controlled trial of the new benefit Payment Card system.

Current planning assumptions are that all post offices will be automated by the end of 2000.

On current plans the trial will be extended to 305 post offices early in 1999.

The Benefits Agency and Post Office Counters Ltd. routinely monitor the project. The trial underway at the moment forms an important part of the monitoring process and is designed as one of a series of tests to assess the performance of the new systems before they are introduced nationally.

Vibration White Finger

Mr. Eric Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applications have been made for medical examinations relating to Vibration White Finger; and how many applications for industrial injuries disablement benefit have been (a) approved and (b) refused following medical examinations. [31728]

Mr. Denham: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is as follows:

The number of claims made to Industrial Injuries Disablement Benefit (IIDB) due to Vibration White Finger from 1 April 1995 to 31 December 1997 is 35,900[1].

The number of Vibration White Finger assessments following medical examination where the disease has been diagnosed, but at less than the level of disability which would attract a payment of benefit (below 14 per cent. disabled), in the same period, is 7,714[2]. The number assessed at 14 per cent. or over is 1,246[2]. There will be a relatively small, but unknown number of assessments made at less than 14 per cent. disabled, that will have resulted in a payment of IIDB, when aggregated with another disease.

Income Support

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to her answer of 23 January 1998, Official Report, column 738, what is her estimate of the (a) mean average and (b) median average amount of income support unclaimed by pensioners in 1995–96. [33626]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The mean amount of Income Support unclaimed by pensioners in 1995–96 was £16.10 per week, and the median amount unclaimed by pensioners in the same year was £9.10 per week.

Children (Poor Households)

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many children are living in households that fall in each of the lowest three deciles of the distribution of equivalised incomes before housing costs; how many are living in lone parent households; and how many are living in households headed by a couple. [32410]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The information is set out in the table.

Number of children in households millions

	Number of children in lone parent families	Number of children in two parent families	All children
Decile 1 (lowest)	0.3	1.2	1.6
Decile 2	0.8	0.9	1.7
Decile 3	0.7	0.9	1.6
All (Deciles 1–10)	2.8	9.8	12.7

Notes:

1. Figures are for 1995–96.
2. The data comes from the Department's Households Below Average Income (HBAI) series, based on the Family Resources Survey (FRS) and covering Great Britain. The FRS data were used to achieve a large enough sample size to provide more robust information. All results are subject to sampling error, and numbers may not sum due to rounding.
3. The income measure used is weekly net (disposable) equivalised income. The definition of income used follows that in the published HBAI series for FRS based results.
4. Figures include 0.6 million children in the bottom three deciles in families classified as self-employed; the reported income of these families may not be an accurate guide to their living standards. Comparisons with household expenditure also suggests that households in the bottom income decile may not have the lowest living standards.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Great Western Trains

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will instruct OPRAF to carry out an urgent investigation into the recent performance of Great Western Trains, with particular reference to (a) punctuality and (b) overcrowding. [33145]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Franchising Director monitors the performance of train operating companies under the terms of the franchise agreement, and he has wide ranging powers under the franchise agreement and the Railways Act 1993 where performance fails to meet the required standards. These powers have been increased following the offer by First Group PLC, a shareholder in the Great Western franchisee, Great Western Holdings Ltd, to buy out the other share holders.

Public Appointments

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many of the appointments to public bodies which he has made since 1 May 1997 have been from the Public Appointments Unit list. [33257]

Angela Eagle: Up to now, no central record has been maintained of the source of candidates for the public appointments made by my Department. Potential candidates are identified from a wide range of sources, including the Public Appointments Unit and advertising. I regret that the information cannot be provided in the form requested.

Millennium Site

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the location and method of disposal of the contaminated soil removed from the Greenwich Millennium Experience site, indicating the tonnage involved; and what was the total cost to public funds of the site clearance. [33201]

Angela Eagle: The statutory remediation of the Greenwich Peninsula has been undertaken by British Gas as the original polluter. Following the completion of the statutory work English Partnerships has undertaken the development remediation to restore the site to a condition fit for its intended end use.

Contaminated soil which cannot be reused on site is disposed of at licensed landfill sites. The contractors employed by English Partnerships are responsible for selecting the location of the landfill sites and a number of different sites have been used. Around 200,000 tonnes of material from the site to be leased to the New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) has been disposed of off-site.

The total cost of the remediation work carried out by English Partnerships on the NMEC site is £13.3 million, of which £3.4 million has been contributed by NMEC.

Green-field Land

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) how many hectares of green-field land, not classified as Green Belt but currently available for building, there are in England; [33477]

(2) how many hectares of green field land not classified as Green Belt, but available for building, there were in England on 1 May. [33482]

Mr. Raynsford: There is no specific definition of 'green-field' land, but it could be interpreted as 'land not previously developed'. This would include land under rural uses (e.g. agriculture, forestry) and also vacant land in urban areas that was not previously developed. Information on the amount of such land available for housing is not held centrally. My Department is currently working with the Local Government Management Board, local authorities, English Partnerships, and others to provide, by early 1999, a consistent assessment of previously developed land available for housing. This will be the first stage of a comprehensive Land Use Database for England, which will in due course provide a basis for assessing other types of land available for development.

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many hectares of green-field land not classified as Green Belt have been built on since 1 May. [33476]

Mr. Raynsford: There is no specific definition of 'green-field' land, but it could be interpreted as 'land not previously developed'. This includes land under rural uses (e.g. agriculture, forestry) and also vacant land in urban areas that was not previously developed. The Department's Land Use Change Statistics provide information on the amount of land not previously developed that has changed to developed uses. Current developments of these statistics will enable separate identification of land inside and outside adopted green belt; estimates for changes that happened in 1994 should be available by mid-1998 and will be updated annually thereafter.

Green Belt

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir S. Chapman) of 11 February 1998, Official Report, column 234, on the Green Belt for what reasons figures are not available for Green Belt recovery before 1 May 1997. [33484]

Mr. Raynsford: Information in the form requested is not collected centrally. I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir S. Chapman) on 11 February 1998, Official Report, column 234; the information relating to the period before 1 May 1997 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the next figures will be published for the amount of Green Belt land in England. [33479]

Mr. Raynsford: There is no specific definition of 'green' land, but it could be interpreted as 'land not previously developed'. This would include land under rural uses (e.g. agriculture, forestry) and also vacant land in urban areas that was not previously developed. The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions has recently commissioned a major new survey of the British countryside. Countryside Survey 2000, as it is known, will provide figures on the amount of different rural land types and habitats. Results will be published in the year 2000.

Some land under rural uses is protected against development, as designated Green Belts. The most recent authoritative figures for the amount of land designated as Green Belt were for 1993. More up to date information will be available by summer 1998.

Schools

Dr. George Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what account he takes of expenditure by local education authorities on the cost of home-to-school transport in determining the standard spending assessment for those authorities; [33492]

(2) what account he takes of expenditure by local authorities on the additional costs of educating pupils in village schools with below average pupil numbers in determining the standard spending assessment for those authorities. [33493]

Mr. Raynsford: In determining the total amount of education standard spending assessments, account is taken of the national costs of schooling including those costs related to home-to-school transport.

In setting the weight to be given to the sparsity factor in allocating the total of education standard spending assessments between authorities, account is taken of small schools with below average numbers of pupils for each teacher and of the costs of transport between home and school.

Capital Receipts

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list for each London borough the capital receipts (a) released in 1997–98 and (b) to be released in 1998–99, giving for each year the proportion used on new building and capital repairs. [30770]

Household Projections

Mr. Tom King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to publish the University of Cambridge Department of Applied Economics study on the need for social housing, referred to in paragraph 19 of "Planning for the Communities of the Future" (Cm 3885). [33829]

Mr. Raynsford: This report was published in January 1998. A copy of the report 'An Economic Model of the Demand and Need for Social Housing' published by DETR has been placed in the House of Commons Library.

Mr. Tom King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate the proportion of the total number of new homes required between 1991 and 2011 which are for existing households migrating to other parts of England. [33820]

Mr. Raynsford: The household projections are not an estimate of the number of new homes that are required. However, it is possible to identify how much of the projected change in household numbers for each region is due to migration of households into or out of the region.

The latest household projections show that between 1991 and 2016 the number of households in England is projected to increase by 4.4 million. The table shows the projected change in households for each Government Office Region, together with the amount of change that is due to net migration of households into and out of the region (including migration to and from the rest of the world). Equivalent estimates for the period 1991 to 2011 are not available.

Household Growth and Migration Component 1991–2016

North East	166	1
North West	412	–8

Yorkshire and the Humber	387	28
East Midlands	418	122
West Midlands	367	–68
Eastern	582	190
London	629	–310
South East	807	257
South West	545	357
England	4,383	526

Note:
The net figure for England of 526,000 households arises from net migration into England of the individuals from other countries.

Rail Freight

Sir Raymond Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what Government grants are available to Railtrack for investment in rail freight facilities. [33702]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Any company, including Railtrack, wishing to move freight by rail rather than by road is eligible to apply for freight facilities grant. The grant is awarded where the environmental benefits of avoiding road transportation justify Government support.

Ivory

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will make it his policy to oppose the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species proposals on the ivory trade; [33617]

(2) what recent representations he has received regarding the resumption of the ivory trade. [33616]

Angela Eagle: A number of individuals and organisations have expressed concern about the decision taken by a large majority at the CITES Conference in June 1997 to open the way for a limited resumption of trade in ivory. Many have also acknowledged the role played by the UK and other EU Member States in securing a deferral of commercial trade until essential safeguards are in place, including the establishment of systems for monitoring poaching and illegal trade. The EU abstained in the final vote but Member States have agreed to respect the majority will of the CITES Parties on a matter which is central to the basis of cooperation on which the future of CITES depends. Conservation of the elephant requires maximum effort to implement the full package agreed by the Conference which goes wider than commercial trade in ivory.

At its meeting in London last week, the CITES Standing Committee, under the UK's chair, reviewed progress. The Committee agreed proposals to allow audited ivory stockpiles to be sold for non-commercial purposes, and the proceeds used for conservation and related work in Africa. CITES representatives also endorsed proposals for two new systems for monitoring elephant poaching and trade. To assist further work, my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment announced a contribution of £175,000. The Committee also allocated additional funds from the Convention's central budget.

Next year's meeting of the Standing Committee will decide whether the conditions which the Parties attached to the decision in 1997 have been met, and whether limited commercial trade can resume between three southern Africa countries and Japan.

Salisbury Transport Study

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the names of the consultants appointed to assist his Department's Salisbury Transport Study and their terms of reference. [33954]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Consultants, to carry out the main work of the Study, have not yet been appointed. A competitive tendering process will be carried out at the end of this month to decide which consultants to appoint. We hope to announce the name of the successful bidders in May.

The terms of reference for the consultants are due to be finalised within the next two weeks.

A406

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the spring deadline for the completion of the upgrade to the A406 at Sterling Way and Fore Street will be met; and what steps he is taking to ensure that there will be no further delay to the completion of these works. [33714]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 10 March 1998]: I have asked the Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Lawrie Haynes, to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Andrew Love, dated 11 March 1998:

The Transport Minister, Glenda Jackson, has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the improvements to the A406 at Sterling Way and Fore Street.

When I wrote to you last July, the timetable I gave you for the expected completion of the tunnel and for the full contract was considered realistic. However, since then I am afraid that progress in completing the tunnel has been seriously affected by the unexpected high volumes of water penetrating the walls of the tunnel structure, a problem which became more prominent with the high rainfall of the early winter months. Happily, the contractor has sealed the leaks and the problem is now under control. An added difficulty is the complexity of the mechanical and electrical equipment, which requires highly specialised and skilled personnel.

We now expect the tunnel to be completed and open to traffic this June, whilst the full contract is planned to be completed by late Summer. However, with the aim of bringing forward the completion of the full contract, we are working with the contractor to see whether any of the works planned to be carried out after completion of the tunnel, can be carried out in parallel with the tunnel works.

If it would help, I would be happy to arrange a site visit, so that you can see the problems at first hand.

Rail Regulator (Correspondence)

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will establish how many items of correspondence the Rail Regulator recorded as missing in the last year. [33690]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Rail Regulator has not recorded any items of correspondence missing in the last year. I understand, however, that he has assisted in the resolution of a complaint from one of the hon. Member's constituents, during which the train operator involved mislaid some earlier correspondence.

Basking Shark

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to announce his decision in respect of endangered species status for the basking shark; and if he will make a statement. [34009]

Angela Eagle: Consultations have now concluded on the Joint Nature Conservation Committee's recommendations regarding species which should be afforded protection by their listing on Schedules 5 and 8 to the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. Preparations for an Order to implement the necessary protection are underway, and an announcement of the levels of protection to be afforded to all the species subject to current review, including the basking shark, is expected to be made before the end of March 1998.

British Waterways Board

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about the external financing limit for the British Waterways Board. [34327]

Angela Eagle: The 1997–98 External Financing Limit for the British Waterways Board will be increased by £1,000,000 from £51,360,000 to £52,360,000. This will enable them to carry out additional major repairs to the canal network and other urgent maintenance. It will be funded by an increase in grant-in-aid to the Board arising from savings elsewhere on Class VI, Vote 3.

Government Offices of the Regions

Mr. Mike Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the Government propose to continue to have separate Government offices for the North-West and Merseyside. [34328]

Mr. Caborn: We have decided to merge the Government Offices for the North-West and Merseyside. Links between the Government Office and the proposed Regional Development Agency for the North-West will be simpler if they, like those in the rest of England, cover the same geographical area.

The intention is to establish the single Government Office by about October 1998. We will consult the unions before the merger takes effect. We intend the new Government Office, whose title will be the Government Office for the North-West, to retain premises in Manchester and Liverpool. The Liverpool office has a particularly important role in the administration of Objective 1 European funding and the associated programmes.

Building Inspectors

Mr. Alan Johnson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how he intends to handle applications from bodies seeking Approved Inspector status under part II of the Building Act 1984. [34329]

Mr. Raynsford: I intend to make regulations further amending the Building (Approved Inspectors etc.) Regulations 1985. These amendment regulations will provide that, with effect from a date later this year, applications from corporate bodies seeking approved inspector status shall be made to a designated body, not, as now, to the Secretary of State. I intend that the Construction Industry Council will be designated for this purpose. The CIC is already the designated body for applications from individuals seeking approved inspector status.

In preparation for this change, I am arranging for the CIC to undertake assessment of all new applications from corporate bodies received by my Department from now on. I will decide such applications in the light of the CIC's advice, in cases where the CIC's assessment is complete before the coming into effect of the amendment regulations. In cases where assessment is not complete when the amendment regulations take effect the decision will become the responsibility of the CIC.

There are a number of applications currently with the Department from companies seeking approved inspector status. I have decided to approve an application from RBC Ltd. This approval will take effect from 1 April 1998. My Department is notifying local authorities of this approval, in accordance with the Approved Inspectors Regulations. Subject to consultation with the applicants, the Department will arrange for the CIC to take forward the assessment of some of the remaining applications currently with the Department on the same sort of basis as for new applications.

Wider competition between approved inspectors and local authority building control should be a stimulus to greater efficiency and higher standards of service to the customer. To help bring about this result, I am working to devolve the setting of charges for local authority building control to individual local authorities. I also wish to see arrangements put in place for setting and monitoring compliance with common standards of building control applicable across the public and private sectors. I therefore welcome the establishment by the Local Government Association, the Construction Industry Council and the Association of Corporate Approved Inspectors of a Steering Group to draw up recommended standards and monitoring arrangements. The Steering Group will be holding its first meeting shortly.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Official Hospitality

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is his current estimate of the expenditure of his Department, its agencies and non-departmental public bodies on hospitality since 1 May 1997. [27795]

Mr. Hoon: £98,313.

Consultants

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is his estimate of the expenditure of his (a) Department, (b) agencies and (c) non-departmental public bodies on external consultants in (i) 1995–96, (ii) 1996–97, (iii) 1997–98 to date and (iv) 1997–98 full year; and if he will also estimate the cost savings resulting from the employment of such consultants for each of the above years. [26668]

Mr. Hoon: The table shows the estimated expenditure figures for External Consultants during the required periods:

	Department	Agencies	NDPBs
(i) 1995–96	1,231,000	645,000	64,260
(ii) 1996–97	397,662	1,836,793	104,615
(iii) 1997–98 to date	415,274	1,446,467	33,541
(iv) 1997–98 (full year estimate)	783,179	2,423,730	66,595

The Agencies with expenditure were the Court Service, Public Record Office, Public Trust Office, Land Registry and Northern Ireland Court Service. The NDPBs with expenditure were ACLEC, Legal Aid Board, Law Commission, Court Service Tribunals and the Legal Aid Department for Northern Ireland. In many cases consultants are employed to contribute particular skills to an element of a much larger process. As a result their work will be only one of several factors leading to the eventual outcome. There is therefore no ready way of apportioning their particular contribution to savings achieved. Those specialists were not available from within Departmental resources.

Official Accommodation

Mr. Forth: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many rooms there are in the Lord Chancellor's official accommodation; and how many will be fully open to the public. [32953]

Mr. Hoon: There are nine rooms in the Lord Chancellor's official residence, not including utility or bath rooms. Five of these rooms, the dining room, drawing room, principal bedroom, and the River Room, together with its Study Annex, will be open to the public.

Conveyancing

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will take measures to enable a vendor to recover from a potential purchaser conveyancing costs incurred at the request of the potential purchaser if the latter withdraws their offer before completion. [32961]

Mr. Hoon: It would not be appropriate to take such a step in advance of the report of the consultants who are currently undertaking a detailed study of the house buying process on behalf of the Government. However, this is one of many helpful suggestions which have been made with a view to making the process more certain, and each will be considered carefully in the light of the report by the consultants.

Conditional Fees

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if (a) solicitors and (b) barristers will be permitted to use the conditional fee arrangement proposals announced on 4 March for actions for (i) defamation, (ii) passing off, (iii) malicious falsehood, (iv) false imprisonment, (v) malicious prosecution, (vi) breach of confidence and (vii) breach of copyright claims. [33896]

Mr. Hoon: The Government see no reason to limit the types of proceedings for which conditional fees should be available other than where there are statutory prohibitions. Conditional fee agreements would therefore be available for the matters mentioned by the hon. and learned Member if the Government's proposal was implemented. I would welcome views on the proposal during the consultation period which ends on 30 April.

DEFENCE

Public Appointments

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of the appointments to public bodies which he has made since 1 May 1997 have been from the Public Appointments Unit list. [33245]

Mr. Spellar: MOD seeks nominations of candidates for appointments to public bodies using a wide range of sources, including the Public Appointments Unit and advertising, to ensure that there is the widest possible dissemination of information about vacancies. Since 1 May 1997, 4 appointments to public bodies have been made from the Public Appointments Unit list. In addition, a further 11 have been considered for appointment but were not successful.

Export Licences

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many applications for export licences were circulated to his Department by the Export Control Organisation during each of the four week periods beginning (i) 3 May 1997, (ii) 31 May 1997, (iii) 28 June 1997, (iv) 26 July 1997, (v) 23 August 1997, (vi) 20 September 1997, (vii) 18 October 1997, (viii) 15 November 1997, (ix) 13 December 1997, (x) 10 January 1998 and (xi) 7 February 1998. [33374]

Mr. Spellar: The information requested is set out in the table:

Four week period beginning	Number of applications received
3 May 1997	724
31 May 1997	765
28 June 1997	715
26 July 1997	939
23 August 1997	775
20 September 1997	768
18 October 1997	865
15 November 1997	864
13 December 1997	501
10 January 1998	789
7 February 1998	968

Gulf War Syndrome

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many notices of intention to claim compensation for their illnesses have been received so far by his Department from service personnel who served in the Gulf War; and how many writs have so far been received from such personnel. [33844]

Dr. Reid: Up to 6 March 1998 the Ministry of Defence had received a total of 1,751 notices of intention to claim in respect of Gulf related illness. 93 have been withdrawn, leaving a total of 1,658 current notices of intention to claim held by my Department. Of these, 260 are in respect of civilians or the children of Service personnel and civilian Ministry of Defence employees. No writs have yet been served against the Ministry of Defence in respect of any of these cases.

In addition to these 1,658 notices of intention to claim, the Ministry of Defence is investigating 10 claims alleging negligence in the diagnosis and treatment of Post Traumatic Stress Disorder said to have arisen from service in the Gulf. 5 of these claimants have issued proceedings.

Chemical Weapons

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he intends to publish the section on riot control agents which was included in the United Kingdom's initial declaration to the Organisation for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons; and if he will make a statement. [33845]

Dr. Reid: I will write to my hon. Friend and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 28 January 1998, Official Report, columns 247–48, on nuclear weapons, at which of his Department's properties the five station nuclear accident response teams are based; and when, and for what reasons, the name of the teams was changed from special safety teams. [33854]

Dr. Reid: The five RAF nuclear accident response teams are based at RAFs Honington, Marham, Brize Norton, Lyneham and St. Athan. Their title was changed from special safety teams to nuclear accident response teams in 1996 as it was felt the new term was more definitive.

RAF Menwith Hill

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 26 January 1998, Official Report, columns 32–33, on RAF Menwith Hill, how many reviews of breaches of security at RAF Menwith Hill have been carried out by the National Security Agency since 1990; and on how many occasions his Department received copies of the reports resulting from such reviews. [33857]

Dr. Reid: Two reviews of breaches of security have been conducted by the National Security Agency at RAF Menwith Hill since 1990. One was conducted in October 1993, as the hon. Member is already aware, and the other in April 1997. My Department was made aware of the contents of both reports at the time.

Fisheries Protection Service

Mr. Bruce George: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of the Fisheries Protection Service. [33999]

Dr. Reid: The Royal Navy's involvement in Fishery Protection is currently being examined within my Department's Strategic Defence Review.

Explosives (Thefts)

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many sticks of plastic explosive were removed from the Sennybridge Infantry Training Centre, Wales in the period June to September 1997. [33685]

Dr. Reid: Five sticks of plastic explosive were stolen from the Army Training Centre, Sennybridge last year. The individual responsible for the theft has since been sentenced to seven years' imprisonment.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the findings of the board of inquiry review into the theft of explosives from the Sennybridge Infantry Training Centre. [33687]

Dr. Reid: Boards of Inquiry are investigations internal to the Ministry of Defence and their findings are not normally published under exemption 2 of the Code of Access to Government Information. I will, however, write to the hon. Member when the Board of Inquiry has reported, with its findings.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many incidents of (a) explosives and (b) detonators being removed or stolen from army bases were reported in the period September 1996 to March 1998. [33684]

Dr. Reid: Between September 1996 and March 1998 one case of explosives and detonators being removed or stolen from an Army establishment was reported. This was the case involving the Army Training Centre, Sennybridge.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the security lapses which allowed plastic explosives and detonators to be stolen from Sennybridge Infantry Training Centre in 1997. [33686]

Dr. Reid: A Board on Inquiry has been instigated to investigate the theft of explosives from the Army Training Centre, Sennybridge.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Mr. Clifford Hughes

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when Mr. Clifford Hughes can expect to receive an amended firearm certificate, number 97/1143. [33976]

Mr. Michael: The processing of applications for firearms certificates, including amendments to those certificates, is a matter for the police force in whose area the applicant resides or works. No record is kept centrally of certificates granted or amended.

Campsfield House

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to publish the Manwaring Report on Campsfield House. [33977]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Manwaring Report on Campsfield House was not intended for publication. This report was a management document to assist in dealing with the immediate aftermath of the disturbance on 20 August 1997. The report of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons, which covers similar ground, will be published shortly.

Whitemoor Prison

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what instructions were issued prior to 9 September 1994 to senior officers at HMP Whitemoor concerning the completion of written reports following serious incidents at the prison. [32778]

Ms Quin: Instructions issued to officers prior to 9 September were those contained in Circular Instruction 18/1988, a copy of which is in the Library. This instruction to governors, which was issued on 12 May 1988, revised earlier guidance to staff on the reporting of incidents.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many staff attended the training session held on how to behave in court for HMP Whitemoor personnel due to give evidence at the January 1997 trial of those accused of the HMP Whitemoor escape; who conducted the training session; and what subjects were covered in the training session. [32780]

Ms Quin: All staff required to attend court hearings were invited to attend a general training session on court procedures. No training was provided in respect of the presentation of evidence connected with the specific trial itself. Training in court procedures using hypothetical cases, including the practice of giving evidence, was provided by a designated governor at Whitemoor who had responsibility for court liaison.

The governor also produced a training pack to assist officers called to give evidence at court. In the course of the trial proceedings, a copy of this training pack was supplied to the defence.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what disciplinary action was taken against staff at HMP Whitemoor assessed by his Department to have given misleading information to the Woodcock Inquiry. [32781]

Ms Quin: No formal disciplinary action was taken against any staff in respect of matters arising out of the Whitemoor escape.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what dates between 24 April 1994 and 8 September 1994 the HMP Whitemoor Governor visited the special secure unit within the prison. [32782]

Ms Quin: Records are incomplete in terms of detailing visits to the Unit. The then Governor believes he visited the Unit on three to six occasions in the period April 1994 to September 1994.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) on what date metal detecting portal equipment was (a) delivered to and (b) installed at the visitors' entrance at HMP Whitemoor; [32783]

(2) on what date an x-ray machine was (a) delivered to and (b) installed at the visitors' entrance at HMP Whitemoor; [32784]

(3) if (a) metal detecting portal equipment and (b) an x-ray machine at the special secure unit at HMP Whitemoor were in place in September 1994. [32785]

Ms Quin: The metal detecting portal equipment was delivered and installed in May 1995. The x-ray equipment was delivered and installed in May 1995. No metal detecting portal equipment or x-ray equipment was in place in the Special Secure Unit in September 1994.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions between 1 May 1994 and 9 September 1994 searches were carried out of HMP Whitemoor staff arriving for work; and if it was possible for staff approaching the prison to see in advance that such searches were being carried out. [32786]

Ms Quin: Regular searching of staff was not carried out before September 1994 and records of searches of staff were not maintained. It would have been possible for staff approaching the prison to see that such searches were in progress.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library transcripts of interviews with prison staff conducted by Sir John Woodcock and his inquiry team into the 9 September 1994 escape from HMP Whitemoor. [32787]

Ms Quin: The Woodcock investigation into the escape from Whitemoor was an independent inquiry commissioned by the then Home Secretary. Sir John Woodcock made it clear in the introduction to his report that all information provided to the inquiry would be treated with total confidentiality. Staff and others were told that the information provided would not be released without their consent or by order of a court.

Prison Staff

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library a copy of advice issued in 1991 to prison governors encouraging them to provide training to staff on being a witness in court; and what monitoring is carried out to assess the effectiveness of such training. [32779]

Ms Quin: Circular Instruction 7/91 gives guidance to governors and staff in order to alleviate anxieties about the experience of appearing as a witness in court, and to avoid possibly prejudicing the outcome of a trial due to inappropriate behaviour. It was issued following the serious disturbances during April 1990 which resulted in unprecedented numbers of prison staff and prisoners being called as prosecution witnesses in criminal trials. Part 1 deals with prison staff appearing as prosecution witnesses and Part 2 relates to prisoners appearing as prosecution witnesses against other prisoners. A copy is available in the Library.

The Prison Service, in response to this Circular Instruction, provides staff with cards which give useful information to witnesses preparing to give evidence in court. No formal monitoring has been carried out to assess the effectiveness of such guidance.

Manslaughter Sentences

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average sentence for a person convicted of manslaughter in the last year for which figures are available. [33496]

Mr. Michael: In 1996, 232 offenders were sentenced at the Crown Court for manslaughter offences—an offence under Common Law or the Offences against the Person Act 1861, sections 5, 9 and 10. Of these, 13 were given hospital or restriction orders under the Mental Health Act 1983, sections 37(1) and 41, five a community sentence, three a fully suspended sentence and six were detained under section 53 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933. The remaining 205 were given a custodial sentence, of which 13 were life sentences. The average sentence length (excluding life) was 61.2 months.

Manslaughter due to diminished responsibility is an offence under the Homicide Act 1957, section 2.

Of the 22 offenders sentenced at the Crown Court in 1996 for this offence, 15 were given hospital restriction or guardianship orders under the Mental Health Act 1983, sections 37(1) and 41. The remaining seven were given a custodial sentence, including one life sentence. The average sentence length (excluding life) was 61 months.

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the range of sentences available for those convicted of manslaughter. [33473]

Mr. Michael: The maximum penalty for manslaughter is life imprisonment and under section 2 of the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997 the courts must impose a life sentence on offenders convicted of manslaughter committed after 1 October 1997 who have a previous conviction for a serious offence (as defined in the 1997 Act), unless there are exceptional circumstances.

Subject to the requirements of the 1997 Act, sentences in individual cases are a matter for the courts to decide from the full range of sentences available, taking into account the seriousness of the offence, including whether the offence is so serious that only a custodial sentence can be justified. The range of sentences available to the courts include: absolute or conditional discharges; fines; community sentences; hospital orders; suspended sentences; or immediate custody.

Laboratory of the Government Chemist

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 2 March 1998, Official Report, columns 468–69, what were the reasons for the increase in the value of contracts placed with the Laboratory of the Government Chemist in 1996 and 1997. [32998]

Mr. Straw: Two high value contracts have been let since 1996 with the Laboratory of the Government Chemist (LGC).

The Prison Service (Supply and Transport Services) initiated a competitive tender in late 1995 for a single contract to replace large numbers of small contracts with various suppliers because they were not cost effective. LGC won this competition (but has in a subsequent competition lost it to a competitor with effect from April 1998).

The Police Information Technology Organisation had previously let a competitive contract to University Diagnostics Ltd. which was subsequently bought by LGC (in early 1997).

Eurostar (Immigration Officers)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department under what authority officers of the Metropolitan police perform the duties of immigration officers on Eurostar services between Brussels and London, Waterloo. [33363]

Mr. Michael: Metropolitan Police officers do not perform the duties of immigration officers on any Eurostar services. Officers can carry our frontier controls in order to operate the requirements of Prevention of Terrorism legislation. Metropolitan Police officers do work jointly with other control authorities, including the Immigration Service. On occasions when Metropolitan Police officers operate on board trains without an immigration officer the police officers are asked that they clearly show their police warrants to ensure passengers identify them as police officers.

Human Rights Commissioner

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to appoint a human rights commissioner; and if he will make a statement. [33341]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We have no plans at present to appoint a human rights commissioner. Our position on the appointment of a commissioner or the establishment of a commission remains as set out in the White Paper "Rights Brought Home: the Human Rights Bill" (Cm 3782) which we published on 24 October 1997.

Prison Service

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in what capacity Mr. Brodie Clarke currently serves in the Prison Service. [32788]

Ms Quin: Mr. Clarke is Head of the Pay and Industrial Relations Group.

Special Secure Units

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the conclusions and recommendations of the further review by Sir Donald Acheson of the effect upon prisoners' health of detention in the special secure units; and if he will place a copy of the review in the Library. [32812]

Ms Quin: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg) on 5 March 1998, Official Report, columns 709–10. A copy of Sir Donald Acheson's report was placed in the Library on 5 March.

Strip Searching

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the conclusions and recommendations of the review evaluated by his Department into strip searching procedures; and if he will place a copy of the review in the Library. [32813]

Ms Quin: The Prison Service's review of strip searching is now expected to be completed by May. A copy will be placed in the Library when it is completed.

Millennium Compliance

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many officials or individuals, working within his Department on millennium compliance have (a) given notice of their intention to leave and (b) left the Department in the last six months. [32311]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 3 March 1998]: Two members of staff working on millennium compliance have left the Department in the last six months. No other members of staff have given notice of their intention to leave.

Surveys

Mr. Forth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list each information, promotional, marketing and opinion survey contract, with its value, concluded by his Department and its agencies for the years (a) 1997–98, (b) 1998–99, (c) 1999–2000, (d) 2000–2001 and (e) 2001–2002. [32011]

Mr. Straw: Information in the form requested is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Circus Animals

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will propose EU legislation to protect the welfare and safety of animals in circuses during the United Kingdom's presidency of the EU. [33915]

Mr. George Howarth: We have no plans for such a proposal during the United Kingdom's Presidency.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions have been initiated in respect of cruelty inflicted on animals in the course of approved experiments for each year since 1980; and if he will make a statement. [33017]

Mr. George Howarth [holding answer 6 March 1998]: Prosecutions for such an offence would be instigated under the Protection of Animals Act 1911 offences of cruelty to animals. The Court Proceedings database, held centrally, can identify only the number of prosecutions brought under the Act irrespective of circumstances. However, further sources of information suggest that there have been no prosecutions, in England and Wales, for cruelty to animals during the course of approved experiments.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum seekers have been detained in Scotland under Immigration Act powers in each of the past five years; what is the (i) longest, (ii) shortest and (iii) average time for which they have been detained in each year; and how many cases each year resulted in the asylum seekers being (a) deported, (b) released and (c) dealt with otherwise. [33460]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Regrettably, the information requested is available only at disproportionate cost through examination of individual case records.

My officials are currently engaged in an exercise to determine the status and length of detention of persons detained under Immigration Act powers in Scottish prisons at a particular point in time. I will let the hon. Member have a summary of the findings when that exercise has been completed.

Juveniles (Secure Accommodation)

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) of 2 March 1998, Official Report, column 466, on secure accommodation for juveniles, how many of the 460 places in local authority secure accommodation which he expects to be available by the end of 1998 were initially planned for after 1 May 1997. [33319]

Mr. Boateng: I have been asked to reply.

The 460 total includes six places which have been planned for since 1 May 1997.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Baker: To ask the President of the Council how many and what percentage of written parliamentary questions asked in the current Session have received a holding answer, broken down by Department. [31850]

Mrs. Ann Taylor: The number of holding answers given by each Department and the percentage this represents up to 25 February 1998 are as follows:

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Public Appointments

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many of the appointments to public bodies which he has made since 1 May 1997 have been from the Public Appointments Unit list. [33242]

Mr. Chris Smith: My Department seeks candidates from a range of sources including the Public Appointments Unit, the Department's own register of people who have expressed an interest in public service, through advertising and executive search. Of those appointed since 1 May, eight were on the PAU list, although in each case they had first come to our attention from other sources.

Mr. Peter Davis

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport from what budget the financial settlement to Mr. Peter Davis in respect of his resignation as Director-General of the National Lottery will come. [28601]

Mr. Chris Smith: Payments to the former Director-General of the National Lottery will be met from the Oflot Vote. The Consolidated Fund will be reimbursed for these voted costs in the normal way from the National Lottery Distribution Fund.

National Lottery

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what account he will take of the conclusions of the investigation by the Director-General of Oflot into whether Camelot remains a fit and proper body to run the Lottery in assessing its role as a sponsor of the New Millennium Experience and distributor of tickets for that event. [32233]

Mr. Chris Smith: The proposal that Camelot use their network of National Lottery ticket machines to distribute tickets for the Millennium Experience at Greenwich is a matter for the Acting Director General of the National Lottery. He gave his approval to the proposal which has been agreed in principle between Camelot and the New Millennium Experience Company on 19 February 1998.

The Acting Director General of the National Lottery's investigation into the fitness and propriety of GTech Holdings Corporation to be involved in and benefit from the National Lottery is a separate matter and has not yet been concluded.

WALES

Public Appointments

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many of the appointments to public bodies which he has made since 1 May 1997 have been from the Public Appointments Unit list. [33244]

Mr. Ron Davies: None. As I announced in a press release on 13 June 1997, it is my general policy to advertise appointments to attract a wide field of candidates. My Department is in the process of setting up a new list of potential candidates drawn from responses to these advertisements and other nominations received. This list will be used in conjunction with advertisements in future.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many private finance initiative projects there are in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [33532]

Mr. Ron Davies: There are 11 signed Private Finance Initiative projects that fall to my area of responsibility. Together, these projects have an expected capital value of some £33 million and include a £6 million Community Hospital in Chepstow, a contract for which was signed last month.

Exchange Rates

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received on the impact of current sterling levels upon the exporting industries in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [33538]

Mr. Hain: I have received two such representations. The Government recognise the difficulties for exporters and manufacturers affected by the strong pound. The effect on exchange rates and exports is a factor that the Bank of England takes into account in determining interest rates.

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the number of jobs lost by companies in Wales because of the changes in exchange and interest rates since 1 May 1997 (a) in the current financial year and (b) in each of the next two financial years. [33620]

Mrs. Liddell: I have been asked to reply.

The economic effects of exchange rate and interest rate changes are difficult to isolate, especially at the regional level. The claimant unemployment rate in Wales fell from 6.6% to 5.7% between May 1997 and January 1998. Low inflation and responsible wage bargaining will be key factors in securing healthy longer term job prospects.

National Assembly

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he will announce the venue for the National Assembly for Wales. [33897]

Mr. Ron Davies: I hope to announce my decision shortly.

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what categories of classified documents or other information will be made available to (a) all members of the National Assembly for Wales, (b) members of the Executive Committee and (c) members of other committees. [33932]

Mr. Ron Davies: Final decisions have not yet been reached on this matter. The categories of classified documents and other information extend beyond those dealing with subjects covered by the Official Secrets Act 1989. It will be important for those charged with making decisions on behalf of the Assembly to have available to them such documents or information as are necessary for the proper discharge of their functions.

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment (i) he has made and (ii) his Department has made, of the practical effects of making members of an elected assembly Crown servants for the purposes of the Official Secrets Act 1989. [33930]

Mr. Ron Davies: The practical effects are likely to be limited, given that the Official Secrets Act 1989 is concerned with the unauthorised disclosure of information on matters which generally will not relate to the Assembly's functions. Ministers of the Crown, who are members of an elected Parliament, are Crown servants for the purposes of the Official Secrets Act 1989.

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether refusal to accept being made a Crown servant for the purposes of the Official Secrets Act 1989 will disqualify an otherwise duly elected member of the National Assembly for Wales from being an Assembly member. [33929]

Mr. Ron Davies: The effect of clause 79 of the Government of Wales Bill is that a member of the National Assembly for Wales would automatically be a Crown servant for the purposes of the 1989 Act. There would therefore be no question of a member being disqualified for refusing to accept such a status.

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if a candidate for the National Assembly for Wales will be required to indicate their agreement if elected to being made a Crown servant for the purposes of the Official Secrets Act 1989; and whether failure so to do would be a bar to candidature. [33931]

Mr. Ron Davies: No.

PRIME MINISTER

Ministerial Visits

Q13. Mr. Todd: To ask the Prime Minister when he expects to pay an official visit to South Derbyshire. [32169]

The Prime Minister: I have no immediate plans to do so.

Departmental Employees

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the number of his Department's employees by UK region, indicating the wage bill (a) in total and (b) by region in the last year for which figures are available and separately identifying the costs of London allowances and weightings. [30085]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 18 February 1998]: For this purpose, my office is part of the Cabinet Office. I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service, on 9 March 1998, Official Report, columns 66–67.

Departmental Buildings

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the location and running costs in the last year for which figures are available of each of his Department's buildings. [30086]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 18 February 1998]: For this purpose, my office is part of the Cabinet Office. I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service, on 9 March 1998, Official Report, columns 67–68.

TREASURY

Savings

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the possible impact of the introduction of the Individual Savings Account on the older saver. [32125]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 5 March 1998]: This will depend on a number of factors, including the choices savers make about how to invest their savings. However, the Government's aim with the ISA is to introduce a simple, flexible, accessible and fair tax-free savings environment and to spread the benefit of tax relief on savings to many more savers. We propose not to require cash investors to lock their savings away in order to qualify for tax relief.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to allow older investors who have more than £50,000 in PEPs and TESSAs to transfer the whole value of their PEPs and TESSAs into an individual savings account. [32126]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 5 March 1998]: The Government will announce their proposals in due course.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the additional cost of the tax relief planned for the individual savings account in (a) 1999–2000, (b) 2000–01 and (c) 2001–02, if the overall ISA investment limit of £50,000 is increased to (i) £60,000, (ii) £75,000 and (iii) £100,000, assuming no change in the annual investment limits; and if he will make a statement. [24570]

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the approximate number of people that would lose tax exemption, and what is the estimated tax revenue which would be achieved, if the upper savings limit under the ISA scheme were set at (a) £50,000, (b) £75,000, (c) £100,000 and (d) £200,000. [25262]

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost of tax relief per annum of raising the transfer limit from TESSAs and PEPs to the new individual savings account to (a) £60,000, (b) £100,000 and (c) £150,000. [26231]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 22 January 1998]: This would depend on how investors decided to invest their capital.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the additional cost of tax relief on the individual savings account, for each of the next five years, of altering the proposals as set out in his consultative document of December 1997 so as to allow total individual holdings of PEPs and TESSAs as at 1 December 1997 to be transferred into the new individual savings account without regard to the £50,000 overall investment limit; and if he will make a statement. [24553]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 22 January 1998]: The effect on the cost of allowing investors to transfer all their PEP and TESSA investments into individual savings accounts would depend on how investors invest their capital.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the additional cost of allowing all existing personal equity plans to continue alongside the new individual savings accounts without being counted towards the £50,000 limit on investments. [31551]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 26 February 1998]: This would depend on how people decided to invest their capital in PEPs and TESSAs.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are his estimates for the cost of tax relief under (a) the new individual savings account and (b) the continuation of PEPs and TESSAs, for (i) 2000–01, (ii) 2001–02 and (iii) 2002–03; and if he will make a statement. [24569]

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimates he has made of the cost to the Treasury of the tax exemptions under the proposed system of ISAs (a) in each of the 10 years following introduction and (b) according to (i) sex, (ii) the age groups 21 to 30, 31 to 40, 41 to 50 and 51 to 60 years, (iii) marital status, (iv) employment in the categories (1) working full-time, (2) part-time, (3) housewife and (4) unemployed, (v) number of dependent children aged 0 to 4, 5 to 10 and 11 to 16 years and (vi) socio-economic group; and if he will indicate the assumptions used to calculate the estimates. [27319]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 22 January 1998]: The estimated cost to the Exchequer of the ISA proposals is broadly similar to the combined cost of TESSAs and PEPs, but estimates are sensitive to assumptions made, e.g. how people decide to invest their capital.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what assessment his Department has made of the advantages of making the annual limits for ISAs divisible by 12; [28727]

(2) what are the monthly limits for individual savings accounts for those contributing monthly by standing order. [28726]

Mr. Darling: [holding answer 10 February 1998]: No monthly limits are proposed.

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will ensure that copies of all the responses to the individual savings account consultation process are placed in the Library. [29185]

Mr. Darling: [holding answer 12 February 1998]: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) on 5 February 1998, Official Report, columns 775.

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the revenue cost of introducing individual savings accounts with no limit on the total amount that may be invested in such accounts. [26350]

Mr. Darling: It is not possible to estimate the cost because this would depend on the way in which people decide to invest their capital.

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the amount needed to invest in a tax-free savings account, at current rates of interest, in order to generate a yearly interest income equivalent to (a) the state pension for a single person, (b) the average income for a single pensioner, (c) the average income for a pensioner couple, (d) £10,000 per annum, (e) £15,000 per annum and (f) £20,000 per annum. [26233]

Mr. Darling: The Government are committed to spreading the savings culture; that is why we are introducing individual savings accounts. However, the Government believe that pensions are, on the whole, the better vehicle for providing a secure income in retirement.

We are reviewing the current pension arrangements in the Pensions Review and plan to introduce Stakeholder Pensions in the near future.

ISAs are designed to complement pensions; they are not a substitute for them.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received critical of the proposed £50,000 limit on ISAs. [27724]

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the £50,000 limit on transfer of funds from PEPs and TESSAs to the new ISAs. [27640]

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) individuals and (b) bodies have written to his Department about his proposals to limit tax relief on TESSAs and PEPs in connection with the establishment of ISAs. [32035]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 2 March 1998]: We have received a large number of representations, making helpful comments on our proposals for individual savings accounts, which comment on a number of different areas including the £50,000 limit. The consultation period has now finished and, as I made clear in the House on 3 March 1998, Official Report, columns 868–75, we are considering the responses received.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the estimated cost of tax relief on PEPs on the assumption that tax credits are not paid and single company PEPs are abolished. [28728]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 10 February 1998]: This would depend on how much investors decided to invest their capital in PEPs.

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the assumptions underlying estimates that tax relief on PEPs and TESSAs was £800 million and £450 million in 1997–98 and would be £1,150 million and £550 million in 2000–01 if the current tax reliefs remained. [32060]

Mr. Darling: The Exchequer cost of tax relief for PEPs for 1997–98 of £800 million includes a cost of £300 million for capital gains tax, and £500 million for income tax, of which basic rate repayments are £400 million (including some £300 million relating to the payment of tax credits on dividends on shares of UK companies) and £100 million is higher rate relief. The estimated cost for 2000–01 of £1,150 million assumes that the scheme would continue with the current tax reliefs. The capital gains tax cost is estimated to be £375 million, and the income tax cost £775 million, of which basic rate repayments are £575 million (including some £450 million relating to the payment of tax credits on dividends on shares of UK companies) and £200 million is higher rate relief.

The cost of tax relief for TESSAs for 1997–98 of £450 million includes basic rate relief of around £400 million and higher rate relief of £50 million. The estimated cost for 2000–01 of £550 million includes basic rate relief of around £500 million and higher rate relief of £50 million.

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much he estimates tax relief would be reduced as a result of applying annual and overall limits of £5,000 and £50,000 to PEPs and TESSAs if those schemes kept their current tax reliefs. [32061]

Mr. Darling: This would depend on how individuals invested their capital.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people made use of the system of carry back, carry forward provisions for contributions to personal pension plans in each of the last three years for which figures are available, broken down by (a) sex, (b) the age groups 21 to 30, 31 to 40, 41 to 50 and 51 to 60 years, (c) marital status, (d) employment in the categories (i) working full-time, (ii) part-time, (iii) housewife and (iv) unemployed, (e) number of dependent children aged 0 to 4, 5 to 10 and 11 to 16 years and (f) socio-economic group; and what estimates he has made of future changes in these figures, with particular reference to the introduction of ISAs. [27315]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many new (a) TESSA and (b) PEP schemes have been opened since 2 December 1997. [27725]

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number and present value of holdings in PEPs (a) in total and (b) in bands of values of £10,000. [23662]

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate how many people hold overall TESSA and PEPs investments worth more than (a) £50,000, (b) £60,000, (c) £100,000 and (d) £200,000. [26230]

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people invested (a) up to £1,000, (b) £1,001 to £2,000, (c) £2,001 to £3,000, (d) £3,001 to £4,000, (e) £4,001 to £5,000 and (f) £5,001 to £6,000 in (i) PEPs and (ii) TESSAs in the most recent year for which figures are available. [32067]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 2 March 1998]: The information is not available in the form requested because the last Government failed to require providers to submit enough information on their returns to the Inland Revenue.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assumptions about equity asset growth and future increases in ISA contribution or asset-value ceilings underlie his answer to the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) of 22 December 1997, Official Report, column 472; and which major provider of PEP mortgages is the source of his estimates. [23034]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: The question refers to a calculation made by the Halifax. It is based on a gross return on equities of 6 per cent. above retail price inflation, adjusted to allow for charges and taxes.

National Asset Register

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list all the Government assets in the National Asset Register sold since 1 May, together with sale proceeds and the name of the Government department in receipt of the proceeds. [33649]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 10 March 1998]: A table listing total figures for sales of assets over the last financial year will be provided in the Government's forthcoming Financial Statement and Budget Report.

Ministerial Accommodation (Taxation)

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if a Minister of the Crown is subject to the same tax regime in respect of accommodation and furnishings as an employee who is provided with accommodation and furnishings by his employer. [33870]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 10 March 1998]: The same tax rules apply for Ministers of the Crown as for other office-holders and employees.

Advance Corporation Tax

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his Department's estimate of total surplus unrelieved ACT at the latest date for which figures are available. [33321]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson [holding answer 6 March 1998]: It is estimated that the current amount of surplus unrelieved ACT is £7 billion.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many overseas visits have been made by his Department's political advisers at public expense since 1 May. [25181]

Mr. Gordon Brown [holding answer 23 January 1998]: Special Advisers, along with other departmental officials, have accompanied Ministers to monthly European Finance Ministers' Meetings and European Council meetings and to five international meetings including the G7 Summit.

Departmental Pay

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people employed by (a) his Department and (b) the agencies for which his Department is responsible earn (i) less than £3.20 per hour, (ii) between £3.20 and £3.60 per hour, (iii) between £3.60 and £4 per hour and (iv) between £4 and £4.62 per hour. [30748]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 23 February 1998]: The information requested is as follows:

Chancellor of the Exchequer's departments and agencies	Less than £3.20 per hour	Between £3.21 and £3.60 per hour	Between £3.61 and £4.00 per hour	Between £4.01 and £4.62 per hour

The figures have been based on current staff in post (both permanent and casual) in each of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's departments and agencies. The calculation of hourly rates has been based on annual salaries divided by the number of weeks in the year and number of conditioned hours in a week. Where relevant, London weighting and London allowances have been included in the hourly rate calculations.

VAT (Energy Use)

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to the answer of 23 February 1998, Official Report, columns 60–61, if the rate of 6 per cent. VAT imposed by the Belgian Government covers the purchase of energy-saving materials in Belgium; and what discussions he has held with his Belgian counterpart concerning the formal response received from the European Commission by the Belgian Government following their decision to reduce the rate charged upon such goods. [32189]

Dawn Primarolo: We are not aware that the Belgian authorities apply a reduced rate to purchases of energy saving materials for DIY installation, or that they have been challenged by the Commission. If any information comes to light I will write to my hon. Friend.

I have had no discussions with Belgian colleagues about this issue.

Publications

Mr. Flight: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list those European Commission (a) newsletters, (b) magazines and (c) occasional publications to which his Department subscribes. [33660]

Mrs. Liddell: Items subscribed to on a regular basis by the Treasury and Cabinet Office library include:

SCOTLAND

Chapelcross Nuclear Reactor

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the dates since 1968 on which the Chapelcross Magnox reactor has been inspected for his Department by BNFL or its predecessor. [23403]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 19 January 1998]: Chapelcross site, like all other nuclear sites in the UK, is licensed by the Health and Safety Executive's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate (NII). Regular and frequent inspections are a condition of the site licence and other statutory requirements. Since 1968 a total of 240 inspections have been carried out by the NII, who will continue the programme of inspections during the remaining operating life of the reactors on the site.

Periodicals

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the expenditure of his Department on newspapers and magazines in (a) 1995–96, (b) 1996–97, (c) 1997–98 to date and (d) 1997–98 full year; and if he will list the newspapers and magazines purchased or subscribed to on a regular basis. [26643]

Mr. Dewar [holding answer 5 February 1998]: My Department's expenditure on newspapers and magazines (including journals and periodicals) was as shown in the table. A list of the titles purchased has been deposited in the House Library.

Year	Expenditure
1995–96	215,911
1996–97	220,116
1997–98 (to end January)	185,101
1997–98 (estimate)	210,000

National Galleries of Scotland

Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what account he took, in his recent appointment of new trustees of the National Galleries of Scotland, of the individual views of those appointed towards the establishment of a National Gallery of Scottish Art in Glasgow; if he will assess the financial implications of the policy of establishing such a gallery for the outreach programme involving municipal galleries; and if he will make a statement; [31930]

(2) if he will make a statement on the future of the outreach project in respect of the loaning of centrally held art exhibits to municipal galleries, indicating what recent discussions he has had on the matter with the trustees of the National Galleries of Scotland. [31931]

Mr. Galbraith [holding answer 2 March 1998]: In making appointments to the Board of Trustees, my right hon. Friend is obliged by the National Galleries of Scotland Act 1906 to have regard to the desirability of appointing people with knowledge or experience of Fine Arts, or of management, industrial relations, administration or of any other subject which would be of use to the Board in exercising their functions. He also takes into account other factors such as the gender and geographic balance of the Board as a whole. He does not take account of the views of candidates on any particular aspect of the Board's business.

It is a matter for the Board of Trustees to consider in the first instance the financial implications of any policies which they are contemplating or are pursuing. Where firm, and costed, proposals are presented to my right hon. Friend which require adjustment of existing levels of grant-in-aid he would, first of all, have to be convinced of the merits of the proposals in policy and other relevant terms and, thereafter, to be in a position to provide any additional funding required—taking account of available resources and other competing bids for public funds.

As far as the proposed National Gallery of Scottish Art and Design is concerned, the Board of Trustees are aware of the Government's view that the capital costs of the project would need to be met from non-Government sources and that half of the running costs for at least the first four years of operation would have to be met from private sources. They are also aware that the provision of the balance of the running costs from public funds would be a matter for consideration in future public expenditure rounds.

The Board of Trustees at the invitation of the then Secretary of State agreed in May 1997 to consider a scheme for lending works of art to municipal and other suitable galleries. My right hon. Friend understands that the Trustees are giving consideration to a possible scheme taking account of resource requirements and he awaits their proposals.

Asbestosis

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the incidence and geographical distribution of deaths in Scotland from asbestosis and related diseases for the last five years. [33213]

Mr. Galbraith: The information requested is given in the tables.

Asbestos-related deaths

Sewerage Charges

Mr. Browne: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what relief he will give to domestic customers in respect of sewerage charges in 1998–99. [34451]

Mr. Dewar: The relief available will be £16.47 to customers in the East of Scotland water authority area, £19.48 in the North of Scotland area, and £15.83 in the West of Scotland area.

MINISTER WITHOUT PORTFOLIO

Millennium Dome

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister without Portfolio what is the life span of the plastic interior of the Millennium Dome; and how stable the colour is. [31846]

Mr. Mandelson: The PTFE-coated glass fibre material covering the Dome and its interior has a minimum lifespan of 25 years. There will be a slight alteration in colour over the first few months of exposure to daylight; thereafter the colour remains stable.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Public Appointments

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many of the appointments to public bodies which he has made since 1 May 1997 have been from the Public Appointments Unit list. [33241]

Dr. David Clark: I have made three appointments from the Public Appointments Unit list to public bodies since 1 May 1997. These are: (a) two appointments to the 'Better Regulation Task Force'; and (b) one appointment to the 'Civil Service Appeal Board'.

In addition, I have also made two appointments from the Public Appointments Unit list to the Committee on Standards in Public Life on behalf of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Burden: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) what steps Her Majesty's Government are taking (a) to publicise the existence of public appointment forms and (b) to increase the number of applications from the general public to public appointments; [33466]

(2) how many application forms to be considered for public appointment have been (a) requested by members of the public and (b) sent out in the last 12 months. [33465]

Dr. David Clark: It is important that as many people as possible should have the opportunity to apply for public appointments. All departments seek nominations from a wide range of sources, including advertising, the Public Appointments Unit's central list, other departmental databases and consultation with interested bodies.

Information about the Public Appointments Unit is sent to a range of organisations on a regular basis, and is also available on the Internet.

Members of the public are encouraged to register their details with the Unit by completing a self-nomination form. During the past year, over 2,000 of these forms have been issued. Individuals with specific interests are also advised to register their names with the relevant Government departments.

Government Information

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster for what reasons applicants who make requests for information under the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information are required to ask their hon. Members to submit their appeals to the Ombudsman; and if he will remove this requirement. [33846]

Dr. David Clark: Complaints to the Parliamentary Ombudsman in respect of alleged maladministration, which since 1994 has included non-compliance with the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, are governed by S.6(3) of the Parliamentary Commissioner Act 1967. This requires complaints to be made to a Member of the House, although not necessarily to the complainant's own Member. Under the proposed Freedom of Information Act set out in the White Paper "Your Right to Know" (Cm 3818), appeals would be made direct to the new Information Commissioner.

Absenteeism

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will estimate the rates of absenteeism in his (a) Department, (b) agencies and (c) non-departmental public bodies, for (i) 1995–96, (ii) 1996–97 and (iii) 1997–98 to date; and if he will make a statement. [26580]

Mr. Kilfoyle [holding answer 5 February 1998]: For this purpose the Cabinet Office includes the Prime Minister's Office and the Office of Public Service.

These figures are drawn from records of certificated and non-certificated sick absence; attendance records are not held centrally. Figures for rates of absenteeism in non-departmental public bodies are not centrally held.

New St. Andrew's House

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) what has been the total cost of refurbishment and renovation work on New St. Andrew's House, Edinburgh, since January 1995; [33978]

(2) what is the cost to date of marketing New St. Andrew's House for sale. [33979]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated under the terms of the Framework Document to Property Advisers to the Civil Estate. I have asked its Chief Executive, Mr. John Locke, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John C. Locke to Mr. Alex Salmond, dated 9 March 1998:

I have been asked by the Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service, to reply to your Parliamentary Questions about the total cost of refurbishment and renovation work and the cost to date of marketing New St Andrews House, Edinburgh.

The decision to vacate New St Andrews House was taken because of the potential Health & Safety hazard arising from the presence of sprayed asbestos installed in the building as a recognised acoustic treatment during construction. The two prominent Scottish Agents appointed by PACE to advise on the disposal of the building recommended that the removal of the asbestos prior to the sale would enhance the sale price by eliminating the much publicised blight.

A 12 month contract for the removal of the asbestos was let at a total cost of £1,701,613.00 inclusive of VAT. The contract included the provision of a Show Suite on part of the 8th Floor designed to illustrate that good quality offices could be created within the building. The remainder of the building has been left in a shell and core condition.

Following the completion of the asbestos removal and confirmation that there was no Government requirement for the accommodation, the disposal of the property was launched on 31 October 1997. A closing date for tenders has been set at 31 March 1998. To date the sum of £69,870.00 has been expended on fees, marketing, brochures, advertising and VAT. The indicative sale price is £7.5M.

Dr. George Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the total cost to local education authorities of providing home to school transport in the last year for which figures are available. [33494]

Mr. Byers: LEA expenditure in England on home to school transport was £381 million in 1996–97, the latest year for which figures are available.

Higher Education Funding

Mr. St. Aubyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what estimate he has made of the combined cumulative savings in the financial years 1998–99 to 2000–2001 at 1995–96 prices from the abolition of student grants and the introduction of tuition fees under the Government's preferred approach to the future funding of higher education; [33266]

(2) what estimate he has made of the cumulative additional loans expenditure in the financial years 1998–99 to 2000–2001 at 1995–96 prices under the Government's preferred approach to the future funding of higher education. [33265]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 6 March 1998]: We said in July 1997 that our estimate of the cumulative combined savings from the Government's new higher education funding policy is £250 million by 2000–01. The estimated cumulative additional loans expenditure of £2,250 million by 2000–01 is offset by savings of £2,500 million resulting from the effect of the new fees and grants policy. These figures are for the United Kingdom and in 1995–96 prices. They do not reflect our decision to pay out loans on a termly basis, which released money in 1998–99. Further information will be available following the outcome of the Comprehensive Spending Review.

Teachers (Ill Health Retirement)

Mr. White: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will give the definition of permanently unfit to work used when determining whether a teacher is eligible to retire on the ground of ill health. [33366]

Dr. Howells: The Teachers' Pensions Regulations 1997 define incapacitated in the case of a teacher as unfit by reason of illness or injury to serve as such and likely permanently to be so despite appropriate medical treatment. Permanently is interpreted as including any teaching, full or part-time, up to the scheme's normal retirement age of 60.

Staffordshire Training and Enterprise Council

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what are the amounts currently held in the accounts of Staffordshire TEC. [33149]

Dr. Howells: As of 31 December 1997, Staffordshire TEC's unaudited management accounts were:

retained profits £10,743 million;

cash at bank £9,665 million.

Primary Schools

Dr. George Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the average annual cost per pupil of providing education in maintained primary schools, with pupil numbers of (a) under 30, (b) 30 to 39, (c) 40 to 49, (d) 50 to 59, (e) 60 to 69, (f) 70 to 79, (g) 80 to 89 and (h) 90 or above. [33491]

Mr. Byers: The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

New Deal (Local Authorities)

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps his Department has taken to encourage local authorities to participate in the New Deal programme; and what representations the local authority associations have made to him on the (a) aims and (b) administration of the scheme. [32885]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Effective local partnerships are essential to the success of the New Deal. Local authorities clearly have an important part to play in this. We have encouraged them to become involved fully in local New Deal arrangements and they have done so very successfully.

In addition, I have met on a number of occasions with the Local Government Association (LGA), whose Chairman, Sir John Harman, is a member of the New Deal Advisory Task Force. The LGA and individual local authorities have expressed support for the New Deal and have provided a wide range of comments and proposals concerning many aspects of the programme, all of which we welcome.

Ofsted Inspections

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what percentage of each category of service for children aged under eight years which are subject to statutory social services inspection are also subject to Ofsted inspection; and what was the number of Ofsted inspections undertaken of these services during the last available year. [33849]

Mr. Byers: 15,190 service providers registered under Section 71(1)b of the Children Act 1989 and 488 local authority day nurseries and family centres registered under Section 18 of that Act are in receipt of nursery grant and are subject to Ofsted inspection.

Between September 1996 and March 1997, Ofsted carried out 2,187 inspections of providers registered under the Children Act and in receipt of nursery grant. From April 1997 to 6 March 1998, Ofsted completed a further 10,589 inspections of these providers, and I expect around 2,000 more to have been completed by the end of this month.

Task Force Projects

Mrs. Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations he has received on the environmental criteria for task force projects in the new deal for unemployed under 25-year-olds. [33893]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Department for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, in consultation with my Department and other Government Departments, drew up the environmental criteria against which projects will be assessed. Environmental organisations were consulted fully. We have not had further representations, but we welcome feedback from environmental groups.

New Deal (Voluntary Sector)

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations the voluntary sector have made to his Department concerning the aims of the New Deal programme since the publication of the NCVO/NACVS information pack. [32887]

Mr. Andrew Smith: We have carried out a wide range of consultations with the voluntary sector to encourage them to contribute to the New Deal, and have worked with NCVO and NACVS as part of this process. We are very grateful to both organisations for providing an information pack to enhance that effort. The process of consultation continues, and Ministers and officials are continuing to meet with representatives of the voluntary sector to discuss their potential involvement in New Deal. Given the wide scope of contact, it is not possible to identify specific representations in response to the information pack, but we welcome any feedback—positive or negative—that the voluntary sector may have.

Unemployment (Young People)

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what are his Department's latest estimates of the cost of providing employment, training and education opportunities for 18 to 24-year-olds who have been unemployed for six months or more. [32886]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The New Deal will provide employment, training and education opportunities for 18 to 24 year olds who have been unemployed for six months or more. The latest estimate of the cost to the Department for Education and Employment of the New Deal for Young People during this Parliament is £2.7 billion. The actual cost will depend upon the level of unemployment and experience of running the New Deal.

New Deal (Christchurch)

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is his estimate of the number of people in the Christchurch constituency who will be eligible for the New Deal in April. [32698]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 4 March 1998]: In January 1998 twenty seven 18–24 year olds were recorded as having claimed Jobseeker's Allowance (JSA) for six months or more in Christchurch. The New Deal for 18–24 year olds will benefit all young people who have been claimant unemployed for six months or more and remain unemployed, and all those who reach six months' claimant unemployment.

I have placed in the Library a list showing the indicative planning assumptions for participation in the New Deal for 18–24 year olds in 1998–99 in each local unit of delivery. These planning assumptions are based on current unemployment levels. They are not forecasts of the actual numbers who will participate in the New Deal for 18–24 year olds.

The planning assumption for the Dorset unit of delivery, which includes Christchurch, is that some 2,400 18–24 year olds may be eligible for the New Deal in 1998–99.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list those visits made within the United Kingdom since 1 May on which (a) he and (b) other Ministers within his Department have been accompanied under Rule 83 of the Ministerial Code indicating (i) those persons accompanying and (ii) the cost to public funds. [23749]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 19 January 1998]: Of the visits made within the United Kingdom since 1 May 1997 none of the Ministers from the Department for Education and Employment was accompanied by spouses under Rule 83 of the Ministerial Code.

Departmental Publicity

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what has been the cost of media presentations and press conferences which he has given, other than those held at his Department. [25151]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 23 January 1998]: Since 2 May 1997, direct expense has been incurred in mounting media presentations and press conferences involving Ministers held outside the Department or its Agencies as follows:

Event	Place	Date	Cost (£)
Launch of White Paper "Excellence in schools"	London	11 June 1997	15,385.27
Launch of National Year of Reading	London	29 January 1998	5,000.00
Total			20,385.27

Overseas Visits

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many times his wife has accompanied him on overseas visits; and what was the cost of her travel and other expenses. [25152]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 23 January 1998]: I refer the hon. Member to my reply given to his hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on 15 January 1998, Official Report, column 298.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many overseas visits have been made by his Department's political advisers at public expense since 1 May. [25153]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 23 January 1998]: The overseas trips attended by political advisers are set out in the table.

Destination	Date	Minister	Adviser attendance
Luxembourg	26–27/06/97	Secretary of State	Hilary Benn and Sophie Linden
Paris, France	15–16/10/97	Secretary of State	Sophie Linden
Brussels, Belgium	6–7/11/97	Andrew Smith	Lisa Barclay
Brussels, Belgium	17–18/11/97	Secretary of State	Hilary Benn

Political Advisers (Support Staff)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many secretarial and support staff work full-time in support of his political advisers. [25193]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 23 January 1998]: There are currently two full-time support staff working to the Department's political advisers.

Official Cars

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many official cars are available for use by Ministers in his Department; and how many new cars have been acquired for the use of Ministers in his Department since 1 May. [25154]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 23 January 1998]: There are seven official cars available for use by the Secretary of State and six Ministers in this Department.

One new car has been acquired since 1 May 1997 when the number of Ministerial appointments was increased from six to seven.

Official Entertainment

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many receptions have been held in his Department since he took office; how many people have attended; and what was the total cost of these events. [25156]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 23 January 1998]: Since 2 May 1997 seven receptions have been held in the Department; 250 people have attended. The total cost of these events is £1,488.

New Deal (Maximum Age)

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what the maximum age for entry to the New Deal will be. [30998]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The New Deal for 18–24 year olds will be open only to those in that age bracket. The New Deal for lone parents is available to all eligible people in receipt of income support regardless of age. The New Deal for people with a disability or long-term illness is open to people up to retirement age. The same is true of the New Deal for adults over 25 who have been unemployed for two years or more. We are currently considering extending the New Deal approach to people over 25 who have been unemployed for shorter durations.

Surplus Places

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the proportion of school places in each English county which his Department has identified as surplus in the year 1996–97 in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools and the proportion of surplus places in each county in the financial year 1996–97 in (i) primary and (ii) secondary schools. [30997]

Mr. Byers: Surplus place figures are collected annually and provide a snapshot of the position as at January of that year. For the position as at January 1997 I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) on 26 February 1998, Official Report, column 364.

Training (Over-55s)

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what measures he is introducing to provide training for those over 55 years old. [30999]

Mr. Andrew Smith: As from April 1998, work based training will be introduced for long-term unemployed adults, including those aged between 55 and 63. This will help them to improve their skills and job prospects through an individually tailored combination of guidance, work experience, training and qualifications.

Those over 55 years, who have been unemployed for two years or more, will also be eligible for training opportunities available through the New Deal for long-term unemployed people, which starts in June.

A-level Turkish

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people have gained an A Level qualification in Turkish in each of the past five years. [31654]

Dr. Howells: The numbers of people that have achieved an A level qualification in Turkish over the past five years is given in the table.

1193	87
1994	114
1995	118

Consultants

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is his estimate of the expenditure of his (a) Department, (b) agencies and (c) non-departmental public bodies on external consultants in (i) 1995–96, (ii) 1996–97, (iii) 1997–98 to date and (iv) 1997–98 full year; and if he will also estimate the cost savings resulting from the employment of such consultants for each of the above years. [26682]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 5 February 1998]: Information in the form requested could be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

Absenteeism

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will estimate the rates of absenteeism in his (a) Department, (b) agencies and (c) non-departmental public bodies, for (i) 1995–96, (ii) 1996–97 and (iii) 1997–98 to date; and if he will make a statement. [26683]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 5 February 1998]: Information in the form requested is not available.

Education Spending (Essex)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on (1) the Government's recommended level of spending on education in Essex and the actual level of expenditure for each of the last four financial years; [30702]

(2) if he will make a statement on the Government's recommended level of spending on education in Essex and the figure set by Essex County Council for the financial year 1998–99. [30706]

Mr. Byers: Government support for education spending is provided mainly through the education SSA system but these are not recommended levels of expenditure. Information derived from the authority's General Fund Revenue Account returns suggests that Essex has spent above the level of its education SSA in recent years. For 1998–99, we believe that Essex County Council should use all of the £27 million increase in the education SSA to raise standards in schools.

£ million

	Education SSA	Education spend
1997–98	571.8	582.8
1996–97	567.6	573.5
1995–96	540.5	548.6
1994–95	548.5	549.6

1. Year-on-year comparisons cannot easily be made because of local authority changes of function.
2. The Education Spend figures include a share of net revenue expenditure which cannot be attributed to individual service SSA blocks and capital expenditure charged to the revenue account.

Sixth Form Colleges (Redundancies)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many compulsory redundancies have been imposed by sixth form colleges in each council area in each of the last three years. [31941]

Dr. Howells: The information is not available.

Class Sizes

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what has been the average class size in sixth form colleges in each council area in each of the last three years; and what estimates he has made for the next three years. [31940]

Dr. Howells: This information is not centrally available.

A-levels

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many A level subjects have been discontinued in sixth form colleges in each local education authority area in each of the last three years. [31943]

Dr. Howells: The information is not available on the basis requested. The following data, on a regional basis, give details of planned withdrawal of A level courses as notified to the Further Education Funding Council in July each year.

Transsexuals (Employment Rights)

Kali Mountford: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to hold discussions with (a) legal experts, (b) medical experts and (c) representatives of transsexual people with regard to the consultation paper Legislation Regarding Discrimination on Grounds of Transsexualism in Employment. [33124]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Department intends to have discussions with medical experts and representatives of transsexual people as part of the consultation process. Legal expertise is available within the Department and Government, although we will consider any comments received from others in the legal community who wish to respond to the consultation document.

Kali Mountford: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what submissions his Department has received in response to the consultation paper Legislation Regarding Discrimination on Grounds of Transsexualism in Employment. [33125]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The consultation period is not yet over. So far the majority of comments received in response to the Consultative Paper have been from transsexuals and organisations representing their interests. These have been generally helpful in assisting in clarifying typical experiences at work. Comments from employers, trade unions, local authorities, the medical profession, and educationists are expected.

Kali Mountford: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the ECJ ruling in the case of P v S and Cornwall County Council, with reference to the consultation document Legislation Regarding Discrimination on Grounds of Transsexualism in Employment; and if he will make a statement. [33126]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The European Court of Justice has ruled that to dismiss a person on grounds of gender reassignment is contrary to the Equal Treatment Directive. This Government are fully committed to implementing the ruling in UK law, and will make decisions on necessary changes in the light of outcomes from the current consultation.

Rural Primary School Teachers

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps he will take to ensure that rural primary schools are able to fund the additional costs of the Advanced Skills Teacher grade. [33895]

Mr. Byers: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 10 March 1998, Official Report, column 168.

School Standards

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is his Department's calculation of the proportion of all maintained primary schools with year 6 pupils first inspected by OFSTED in each school year from 1994–95 for which their rating on OFSTED's scale 1 to 7 in inspectors' official judgment recording form subject reports given for their year 6 pupils' comparative standards of achievement at Key Stage 2 in at least one of English, maths and science in the year of inspection is different from that rating they are assigned when all those schools are ranked by the average of the National Curriculum levels attained by their pupils in their Key Stage 2 SAT tests in each of English, maths and science for the same school year of inspection, and when each of these rankings is then partitioned into seven equal groups of schools from the highest scoring group one to the lowest scoring group seven, and each school is then rated by its group number; and if he will list the average level attained per pupil by each such group stated to three decimal places. [28834]

Mr. Byers: This is a matter for HM Chief Inspector of Schools. I have asked him to write to the hon. Member and to place a copy of his letter in the library.

Trainee Teachers

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps his Department is taking to increase the number of recent graduates applying for teacher training. [32546]

Ms Estelle Morris: Maintaining teacher recruitment is one of the major challenges facing the Government and our response to the first report of the Education Select Committee on teacher recruitment, which was published on 29 January, includes details of the action we are taking to encourage more students to become teachers. In particular, as part of our commitment to encourage more graduates to take up teaching as a profession, we have already announced that trainee teachers on postgraduate certificate of education (PGCE) courses will not have to make means-tested contributions towards tuition fees.

New Deal (Personal and Advisors)

Mr. Derek Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps are being taken to ensure that the internal recruitment of New Deal personal advisers does not adversely affect other Employment Service programmes. [32294]

Mr. Alan Howarth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Leigh Lewis to Mr. Derek Foster, dated March 1998:

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment has asked me to reply to your question about the steps that are being taken to ensure that the internal recruitment of New Deal personal advisers does not adversely affect other Employment Service programmes. This is something which falls within my responsibilities as Chief Executive of the Employment Service.

As you know, the role of the Personal Adviser is crucial to the success of New Deal. The Employment Service has considered very carefully the numbers of advisers required both for New Deal and other advisory work. The Employment Service is making staffing arrangements accordingly, and we have selected New Deal Personal Advisers to ensure this function is carried out effectively.

We will be keen to ensure there will be no adverse effects on other Employment Service programmes and I will be keeping our performance in this area under review, and will make any necessary adjustments. I would be very pleased to discuss with you any particular areas of concern.

I hope this is helpful.

Millennium Compliance

Mr. Dorrell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he expects system testing for Year 2000 computer compliance to be completed within his Department. [32398]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 5 March 1998]: System testing for Year 2000 computer compliance is expected to be completed by the end of March 1999.

Mr. Dorrell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list all the contracts placed with external contractors by his Department in connection with Year 2000 computer compliance setting out (a) the name of the contractor, (b) the date the contract was placed, (c) the scope of the contract and (d) the date when the work is expected to be complete. [32397]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 5 March 1998]: The Department has not placed any contracts with external contractors in connection with Year 2000 computer compliance. The Department does, however, have a partnership agreement under which its computer applications are developed and maintained by the FI Group. Under the agreement responsibility for making the applications Year 2000 compliant rests with the FI Group. In parallel with the work of the FI Group the Department's own staff are making compliant the networks and computers on which the applications are run. The joint programme of work is due to be completed by the end of March 1999.

Mr. Dorrell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many officials or individuals working within his Department on Year 2000 computer compliance have (a) given notice of their intention to leave or (b) left the Department in the last six months. [32396]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 5 March 1998]: The senior official responsible for co-ordinating the Department's programme of work for Year 2000 computer compliance retired at the end of January. No other official or individual working on Year 2000 computer compliance has, during the last six months, left or given notice of intention to leave.

Schools (Information)

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what factors determined the decision on whether to distribute material to schools on (a) the United Kingdom Presidency of the European Union, (b) the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting at Edinburgh, (c) the UK Chairmanship of G8 and (d) the UK chairmanship of other institutions. [33015]

Dr. Howells: The decision to mark the UK Presidency of the EU by sending schools a resource pack was largely influenced by a demand from teachers for more sharing of examples of ways in which European awareness can enrich the curriculum and contribute to raising standards.

Because 1997 was designated "The Year of the Commonwealth" by Commonwealth organisations, the Department, in conjunction with the Joint Commonwealth Societies' Council, sent schools a teaching pack "Our Modern Commonwealth" which included information on the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting.

Employee Travel

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will estimate the cost of employee travel on office business, broken down into (a) fuel allowances, (b) unproductive time during travel, (c) other costs related to car transport and (d) costs related to public transport, for (i) 1994–95, (ii) 1995–96, (iii) 1996–97 and (iv) 1997–98. [32440]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 3 March 1998]: Information in the form requested could be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

Head Teachers

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what percentage of head teachers are female. [32547]

Ms Estelle Morris: The latest available figures show that 55 per cent. of head teachers in maintained primary schools and 23 per cent. of head teachers in maintained secondary schools in England in January 1997 were female.

Green Transport Co-ordinator

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he appointed a Green Transport co-ordinator; and on what date the appointment took effect. [32471]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 3 March 1998]: The Guide to Green Transport Plans circulated last September by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson), encouraged Departments to appoint green transport co-ordinators. The Department for Education and Employment appointed a co-ordinator on 5 October 1997 and the appointment took effect from that date.

Students

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many students are currently in part-time (a) further and (b) higher education. [32824]

Dr. Howells: The number of part-time students can be expressed on either a snapshot or a whole year basis. The latest available figures on both counts are given in the following table.

Part-time[1] home and overseas students in the UK 1996–97 (provisional)

	Snapshot[2]	Whole Year[3]
Higher Education[4]	742.6	1,977.6
Further Education	2,097.1	3,717.4

[1] For HE short (less than 19 weeks) full-time courses are recorded as part-time; for FE such courses are recorded as full-time.
[2] The number of students who were on a course which was running on 1 December for HE students and 1 November for the majority of FE students.
[3] The number of students who were on a course during some point in the academic year.
[4] The whole year figure includes an estimated 941,000 students on courses not leading to a qualification on credit and which are not included in the snapshot figures.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Retail Petrol Industry

Mr. Boswell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress has been made in negotiations between the Office of Fair Trading and the retail petrol industry to compile a code of practice covering contractual relationships between wholesalers and retailers. [31702]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths [holding answer 2 March 1998]: The Director General of Fair Trading met with representatives of petrol wholesalers and retailers in October last year in an attempt to facilitate better relations between them. However, the Director General has no powers under the competition legislation to impose a code of practice on the petrol industry, nor is he involved in the negotiation of a code; this is for industry to devise.

Millennium Compliance

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on what date she expects to hold the EU Conference to tackle the Millennium Bug. [33312]

Mrs. Roche: The event will take place in May at a date to be determined. Further details will be made available shortly.

Amending Voice Telephony Directive

Mr. Breed: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the Government's policy in respect of Article 8 of the Amending Voice Telephony Directive. [33234]

Mrs. Roche: The Government will be consulting shortly on their proposed implementation of the Amending Voice Telephony Directive including proposals on how to implement Article 8 of the Directive.

Mr. Breed: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans she has to consult with disabled people and disability organisations in respect of the Amending Voice Telephony Directive. [33232]

Mrs. Roche: The Government will be consulting shortly on their proposed implementation of the Amending Voice Telephony Directive. People with disabilities and disability organisations will be consulted as part of this exercise.

Mr. Breed: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the timetable for compliance with the Amending Voice Telephony Directive. [33235]

Mrs. Roche: The Amending Voice Telephony Directive comes into force on 30 June 1998. The Government plan to consult shortly on their proposals for implementing the Directive.

Mr. Breed: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans she has to ensure that the actions required to comply with the Amending Voice Telephony Directive are in line with OFTEL's proposals. [33231]

Mrs. Roche: OFTEL's proposals on telecommunications services for people with disabilities and the responses to OFTEL's consultation should provide useful input to the development of the Government's proposals on implementation of the Amending Voice Telephony Directive, on which the Government will be consulting shortly.

Mr. Breed: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is her Department's definition of fixed public phone services. [33233]

Mrs. Roche: The term fixed public telephone services is defined in EC law. In the Amending Voice Telephony Directive it is defined as follows:

"Fixed public telephone services may include—in addition to voice telephony service—access to emergency "112" services, the provision of operator assistance, directory services, provision of public pay phones, provision of service under special terms and/or provision of special facilities for customers with disabilities or with special social needs, as set out in this Directive, but does not include value added services provided over the public telephone network."

The Government will be consulting shortly on their proposed implementation of the Amending Voice Telephony Directive.

Export Licences

Mr. Faber: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will list all those departments to whom export licence applications are circulated where necessary by the Export Control Organisation. [33371]

Mrs. Roche: Licences to export strategic goods and other export licences that are required because of UN trade sanctions are issued by the President of the Board of Trade. The Export Control Organisation of this Department is the licensing authority. All relevant individual licence applications are circulated by the DTI to other Government Departments with an interest, as determined by them in line with their policy responsibilities. These include the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Ministry of Defence and the Department for International Development. For specific applications other departments may be involved, in particular where the export of the goods concerned is controlled only because of UN trade sanctions.

Publications

Mr. Flight: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will list those European Commission (a) newsletters, (b) magazines and (c) occasional publications to which her Department subscribes. [33662]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: Publications are purchased as required to support the work of the Department. A list is not kept centrally.

Antiques and Fine Art

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the figures for each year since 1994 for United Kingdom imports and exports of (a) antiques and (b) fine art to and from each country for which figures are available. [33508]

Mrs. Roche: Due to the volume of information requested, the answer has been placed in the Library of the House.

Norweb

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make a statement on the closure of the Norweb maintenance depot and its impact on customers. [33972]

Mr. Battle: The location and number of maintenance depots in a public electricity supplier's authorised area are matters for the supplier concerned. The DGES has introduced guaranteed and overall standards of performance to which public electricity suppliers are required to adhere.

Takeovers (Utilities)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will assess the benefits of outlawing takeovers of United Kingdom utilities by overseas companies. [33973]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: Where an acquisition falls to be considered under the merger provisions of the Fair Trading Act 1973, my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade will consider each case on its merits.

Sub-post Offices

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many sub-post offices have (a) closed and (b) been opened, in Wales, in each of the last five years. [33486]

Mr. Ian McCartney: I understand from the Post Office that data on the numbers of sub-post offices opened and closed in Wales in each of the last five years are not available. Only since the end of the 1996–97 financial year has it been possible for them to disaggregate accurately the numbers of post offices in the Marches and other adjacent areas of England from those in Wales. In total there was a net closure of 18 sub-post offices in Wales between end March 1997 and March 1998.

Regional Selective Assistance

Dr. Ladyman: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will list, for each offer of regional selective assistance made in England during 1997, the percentage of the project's capital cost represented by the grant offered; and if she will group them by region and indicate, for each offer, if it related to an area of full or intermediate assisted area status. [33707]

Mrs. Roche: Each year there are more than 1,000 offers of Regional Selective Assistance in England. Information about the capital costs of individual projects is commercially confidential. However, the table shows the range of percentages of grant to capital costs for the total of RSA offers in 1997. These vary widely according to the type of project and reflect the selective nature of the RSA scheme whereby projects are secured for the minimum necessary cost.

Post Office

Mrs. Lait: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress has been made in giving the Post Office greater commercial freedom. [33674]

Mr. Ian McCartney: I have been reviewing carefully the views advanced by interested parties during the consultations which followed my announcement last year of a review of options for granting the Post Office greater commercial freedom. These will inform our decisions on the next phase of the work. I will make an announcement in due course.

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Wigley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what discussions have taken place during the past three months between Mr. David Durie of the Regional Policy Unit of her Department, and the Chief Executive of the Welsh Development Agency, on matters relating to the international work undertaken by the Welsh Development Agency; and if she will make a statement. [32984]

Mrs. Roche: Mr. Durie met the Chief Executive of the WDA informally last November but has not met him since.

HEALTH

General Social Care Council

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will include proposals for a national register of residential care workers in the White Paper on a General Social Care Council. [33379]

Mr. Boateng: In preparation for the White Paper we are considering the functions of the General Social Care Council, including registration, in discussions within the Government and with the key stakeholders in social care.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he plans to publish the White Paper on a General Social Care Council. [33377]

Mr. Boateng: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 24 February 1998, Official Report, column 172.

Myalgic Encephalomyelitis

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how much his Department has spent on research into the role of general practitioners in the diagnosis and treatment of ME in the last three years; [33345]

(2) how much his Department has spent on research into (a) the psychological treatment of chronic fatigue syndrome and (b) the physical causes of chronic fatigue syndrome in each of the last three years; [33343]

(3) how much support was given by the Medical Research Council for research into ME and chronic fatigue syndrome in each of the last three years; [33342]

(4) how much his Department has spent on research into the role of general practitioners in the diagnosis and treatment of chronic fatigue syndrome in each of the last three years; [33339]

(5) how much his Department has spent on research into (a) the psychological treatment of ME and (b) the physical causes of ME in each of the last three years. [33344]

Ms Jowell: The information is not available in the form requested. Different people in different places have recognised a variety of outbreaks of "related" conditions of chronic fatigue syndrome/myalgic encephalomyelitis (CFS)/(ME) over the last 35 years. However, there is no general agreement about which term should be used. There are advantages and disadvantages in using either the term CFS or the term ME and we will continue to use both.

The main agency through which the Government support medical and clinical research is the Medical Research Council (MRC), an independent body which receives its grant-in-aid from the Office of Science and Technology, which is part of the Department of Trade and Industry. Priorities for funding research in the Department are set very carefully, based on the burden of disease and other criteria, and, as such, bids for conducting research into CFS/ME will always be considered.

The MRC currently provides support for one small project grant in the area of CFS/ME. This is being undertaken by Dr. R. K. Morriss at the University of Manchester and is entitled "The role of noradrenaline in the neuropsychological pathogenesis of the chronic fatigue syndrome". The total amount awarded is £37,000. The MRC is always willing to consider new ideas for research and will consider applications on their scientific merits.

Another research project funded by the Department is entitled "Rehabilitation in the chronic fatigue syndrome—a controlled trial of cognitive-behavioural therapy". This study is complete and considered the question of whether cognitive behaviour therapy can reduce disability in CFS/ME. It was funded by South Thames Regional Office. Funding was for £59,034.

The Department has been funding a research project through the National Health Service research and development programme called "Should General Practitioners manage chronic fatigue syndrome? A controlled trial". This is part of the national programme on primary/secondary care interface. It is an ongoing research project. The NHS funding for this project is £64,433.

In addition, the NHS Standing Group on Health Technology has recently identified the latest series of priority areas for which it anticipates commissioning primary research or systematic reviews. One of the topics identified is management strategies for CFS.

Medical Research

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the amount of money spent on medical research for each of the last five years by his Department; and what are the spending proposals for the next five years. [33324]

Ms Jowell: The Department funds a wide range of health services research which includes medical research. However, the Department's support for medical research is not accounted for separately. Expenditure on National Health Service research and development and on R&D in the health and social services, for the past five years is given in the table; projected spend is also included where available. The NHS R&D levy was first created in April 1996 and figures for NHS R&D prior to this are not available on the same basis.

The Department also funds research through the non-departmental public bodies and from other smaller budgets within the Department. Details of this research are contained in the Department's publication "Summary of Department of Health R&D in Non-Departmental Public Bodies and Divisions Outside RDD" (September 1997), copies of which are available in the Library. The Department also contributes to the Biomedical and Health Research programme, part of the European Community's overall research programme.

Departmental expenditure is also detailed in the "Forward Look of Government-funded Science, Engineering and Technology" (HMSO) published by the Office of Science and Technology, copies of which are available in the Library.

R&D spend in the Department of Health from 1993

1994–95	24.4	—
1995–96	24.5	—
1996–97	28.5	431.8
1997–98 (estimate)	25.4	425.3
1998–99 (plan)	28.4	423.6

[1] Figures are outturn expenditure, except where indicated.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much was spent by each European Union member state on central government-funded medical research in each of the last five years. [33326]

Ms Jowell: The Department of Health does not hold information on other European Union member states' central government expenditure on medical research. The Statistical Office of the European Communities, EUROSTAT, publishes annual statistics on research and development spend in EU member states which includes some information on medical research in the breakdown of government research and development spend. The most recent information is available in "Research and Development: Annual Statistics 1997" EUROSTAT, published by The Office for Official Publications of the European Communities.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the criteria adopted by his Department in assessing the cost/benefit of each medical research project. [33325]

Ms Jowell: In assessing research and development priorities the Department considers the relevance and impact of any topic on the health of the population. Through consultation mechanisms it seeks to support research which is feasible, of good quality, likely to produce value for money for the National Health Service and result in benefits to patient care. The main principles on which decisions for selecting projects are carried out are:

burden of disease and potential benefits to patients relevance to NHS and government policies value for money to NHS and public appropriateness of study design and research methodology

well defined protocol linked to peer review capability of the research terms

Research Ethics Committee approval where appropriate.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pensions

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will make a statement on the general and compensation levies payable under the Pension Schemes Act 1993 by occupational and personal pension schemes. [34452]

Mr. Denham: Regulations to be laid in the near future will allow the development of more efficient administrative procedures for collection of the levies; that will reduce paperwork and be less burdensome for schemes, particularly small ones. The regulations will also simplify the calculation of levy liability, so that new schemes will have to pay only in their third year.

The general levy covers the costs of bodies which exist either to safeguard the rights of, or to provide information to, pension scheme members. These bodies are the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority, the Pensions Advisory Service, the Pensions Registry and the Pensions Ombudsman. Rates of general levy for the 1998–99 year are shown in the table.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what plans the Child Support Agency has to reduce the number of offices from which customers can be dealt with by (a) telephone. (b) personal interview and (c) visits to their home address; [29262]

(2) when hon. Members were informed of the planned changes in CSA offices in their constituencies; what representations she has received from them; and what plans she has to re-examine the proposed changes; [29264]

(3) what consultations there have been in respect of CSA office changes with (a) customers, (b) their representatives, (c) customer support and advice groups and (d) other local interested parties; [29263]

(4) what assessment she has made of the impact of the proposed closure of Child Support Agency offices on (a) customers' transport costs and (b) civil service administrative costs; [29268]

(5) what assessment she has made of the impact of the proposed closure of Child Support Agency offices on other agencies in local areas with particular reference to citizens advice bureaux. [29265]

Mr. Keith Bradley: We expect the Child Support Agency to provide a consistent, fair and efficient service to all its clients. We are looking closely at all aspects of the child support scheme to see where improvements can be made. We aim to bring forward a consultation document on our proposals by the Summer.

The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mrs. Faith Boardman. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Faith Boardman to Mr. Ronnie Fearn, dated 10 March 1998:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Questions to the Secretary of State for Social Security about the operational reorganisation of the Child Support Agency.

Our plans for re-organising are fully in line with the Government strategy of modernising the delivery of public services and reinforce more effectively parental responsibility. We believe our plans will increase compliance and the regularity of payment of maintenance and play an important part in helping lone parents return to work. It may help to explain some details of our current organisation to show how we can improve substantially the accessibility to the public.

The Agency currently has approximately 2900 staff working in Field offices throughout the country. However, in excess of 95% of those staff concentrate on backroom paper processing work so they do not have any face to face contact at all and are no more accessible to the public than those in the major processing centres. The number of staff years which are devoted to face-to-face contact is only currently 120 and in many locations there is fewer than one interview per day. We fully accept that this is not sufficient and restructuring will allow us to offer significantly more face to face contact on a peripatetic basis in a greater range of locations and in conjunction with the Benefits Agency (with whom many of our clients are also concerned). At the same time, we need to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of other forms of contact with customers, and to improve our overall cost-efficiency sufficiently to help keep pace with increases of 50% on our workloads over the next 3 years.

We also know that many of our customers who are working prefer to deal with us by 'phone and do not need to be visited or interviewed but prefer to deal with us in the privacy of their own home outside normal working office hours. We are therefore currently developing proposals on how we might re-focus our resources to cope with an increasing workload which is responsive to our customers needs, while at the same time increase and improve significantly on face to face contact. Our current thinking is that we can move processing work into the Child Support Agency Centres and larger local centres which provide economies of scale and much better value for money for the taxpayer by allowing us to re-focus approximately £5 million on clearing the backlogs of work and rising workloads. Processing paper in small offices is significantly more expensive and the restructuring will allow us to both improve our overall range of customer contact and our overall processing.

So while we may not retain a permanent presence at our 218 sites we will still provide interview facilities where appropriate. We know a proportion of our customers will need to have face to face contact for a number of reasons but not necessarily at a DSS office. We are therefore exploring other options which could include for example Citizens Advice Bureaux or other Government facilities to increase our accessibility to the public.

As Ministers have announced, part of our strategy to improve face to face contact with our customers is by working more closely with our colleagues in the Benefits Agency. From April 1998, Benefit Agency staff will interview and assist new Income Support parents with care to complete their maintenance application form where appropriate. Pilot studies have shown this to be both very cost effective and welcomed by individual customers. 75% of our parents with care will be interviewed; customers will have to provide information only once, thus reducing overlap and repetition of work and it will reduce the incidence of fraud.

We have also recently completed an evaluation on positive customer contact on the use of the 'phone. This has shown that early telephone contact with absent parents increases compliance and helps to speed up the assessment process which is a major concern to both individuals and their representative groups. Parents with care should therefore receive maintenance more quickly and it should help prevent arrears building-up for absent parents. We have also piloted a new approach in the way we deal with self employed cases which includes use of the 'phone and where appropriate or necessary, face to face contact, and this has been found to improve compliance significantly.

With regard to consultation, we have presented our initial thoughts to the Agency's National stakeholder group which includes some 20 organisations such as National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux, the Child Poverty Action Group, the National Stepfamily Association and Families Need Fathers. The Agency also produces a quarterly newsletter "Open Door" which is issued to all of its registered stakeholders. The October 1997 and January 1998 editions contain articles about the Agency's four year modernisation programme which will involve transferring processing work from small local offices to its main centres and a number of other large processing sites. The Agency Trade Union Side have also had the opportunity to participate in our planning and will be consulted as our plans are developed.

I am conscious, however that moving the backroom paper processing work which does not require face to face contact has to be done in conjunction with improvements to our telephone service and increase in staff resources in the Centres. This will allow us to open our 'phone lines for much longer and help to reduce the delays customers currently experience and is part of the review for the plans covering a four year period. I have asked for some further work to be done to examine how we can improve and increase face to face contact to deliver the Active Modern Service which our customers have every right to expect.

Our objective in reorganising the way the Agency does its business is to provide an efficient accurate service which is more responsive to the variety of needs of our customers, and which offers them access and information in a range of customer-friendly forms to suit their variety of needs. This will increase the flow of maintenance and, where appropriate, enable parents with care to move from welfare to work.

I hope this is helpful.

Mrs. Ann Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the average debt of an absent parent at the time when the first Child Support Agency maintenance assessment decision was issued in the last year for which figures are available. [29784]

Mr. Keith Bradley: Children are entitled to the financial and emotional support of both parents wherever they live. We are looking closely at all aspects of the child support scheme to see where improvements can be made. We will bring forward a consultation document on our proposals by the Summer.

The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mrs. Faith Boardman. She will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Faith Boardman to Mrs. Ann Cryer, dated 10 March 1998:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about Child Support Agency maintenance assessment debt.

The child maintenance formula can require the Agency to enquire, look at and consider over 100 pieces of information before an assessment can be made and it is inevitable that some time will elapse before the maintenance assessment is made and the absent parent notified of his liability. The period between the date the child support maintenance liability begins and the date the maintenance assessment is made is referred to as the Initial Payment Period. Information on Initial Payment Periods is collected by the Agency's Financial Management System, and is only available at the current date and not for a retrospective period.

The average amount of maintenance outstanding relating to the initial payment period, as at 16th February 1998, was £1,077.41. However, once maintenance liability has been established, there are several major factors which may quickly reduce this amount.

The child maintenance enquiry pack advises absent parents to continue making court order payments in the usual way until a maintenance assessment has been made. It also states that other payments presently being made for the children may be offset against any maintenance the Agency calculates; when these are reported and verified as child support maintenance, the amount of arrears is reduced accordingly. Either or both parents may ask for the assessment to be reviewed at this stage, which can lead to an adjustment in the original amount.

The Agency addresses the issue of debt accumulating in the initial pay period by establishing contact with the absent parent as early in the process as possible and has also a facility to defer the effective date of an application for 8 weeks if an absent parent quickly returns his or her maintenance enquiry form. Encouraging the absent parent to cooperate with the Agency shortens the time between application and assessment, thus minimising the build up of arrears.

These policies have proved to be effective as, from April 1997 to the 31 January 1998, the Agency has recorded over £29m in voluntary payments made during the initial payment period in cases subsequently using the collection service.

I hope this is helpful.

Benefit Integrity Project

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants of disability living allowance have had their claims (a) increased and (b) decreased as a result of the Benefit Integrity Project since August 1997; and if she will make a statement. [31604]

Mr. Denham: The administration of the Benefit Integrity Project is a matter for Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from David Riggs to Mr. Lembit Öpik, dated 10 March 1998:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked Peter Mathison to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the number of claimants of Disability Living Allowance who have had their claims (a) increased and (b) decreased as a result of the Benefit Integrity Project since August 1997. As Mr Mathison is away from the office on leave, I am replying.

As at 31 December 1997, a total 40,615 cases, have been examined as part of the BIP. Of the total cases dealt with 978 have had their benefit increased, 31,920 have been unchanged and 7,717 have had their benefit reduced/stopped. The total includes 7,462 renewal cases; of which 242 had their benefit increased, 3,868 remain unchanged and 3,352 have had their benefit decreased.

A brief monthly statistical report is produced and a copy of the report for December 1997 and subsequent months can be found in the House of Commons Library.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to her answer of 13 February 1998, Official Report, columns 429–30, concerning disability living allowance claimants mistakenly included in the Benefit Integrity Project, how many of those mistakenly contacted to date have (a) had their disability living allowance reduced, (b) had their disability living allowance stopped, (c) had no change made to their disability living allowance and (d) had their disability living allowance increased; and of those in (a) and (b) how many have sought a review of the Adjudicating Officer's decision and with what result. [31886]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 2 March 1998]: The Benefit Integrity Project aims to ensure that those in receipt of DLA are entitled to it. While it is right to check that people are receiving the correct amount of benefit, we are determined that those checks should be undertaken as sensitively as possible. Also, that we should ensure all decisions taken as a result of the project are right. We have, therefore, acted to introduce an extra safeguard to improve the quality of, and confidence in, benefit decisions made by the Project.

The administration of the Benefit Integrity Project is a matter for Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from David Riggs to Mr. Paul Burstow, dated 10 March 1998:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked Peter Mathison to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question, pursuant to her Answer of 13th February, Official Report, columns 429–30, concerning Disability Living Allowance (DLA) claimants mistakenly included in the Benefits Integrity Project (BIP), how many of those mistakenly contacted to date have (a) had their DLA reduced, (b) had their DLA stopped, (c) had no change made to their DLA and (d) had their DLA increased: and of those in (a) and (b) how many have sought a review of the Adjudicating Officer's (AO's) decision and with what result. As Mr. Mathison is away from the office on leave, I am replying.

Where it is possible to identify from DLA records people who are in the exempt categories, these people are not visited or sent postal enquiry forms. The Benefits Agency has, however, acknowledged from the outset that some people in exempt categories will not be identified. That is because the main disabling condition which leads to an award is recorded using a numerical code, input at the time DLA is awarded. There are instances where the code alone will not always identify exempt groups. Paper files are also scrutinised by clerical staff in case there is further information available. Sometimes, especially where people have more than one disabling condition, it may not be clear that they are in one of the exempt groups and they may, therefore, be contacted.

If the customer does not bring relevant information to the attention of the visiting officer the Agency does not expect visiting officers to judge if a customer is in one of the categories we agreed not to contact directly. Many disabled people are helped by the use of aids which can disguise the extent of their disability and some conditions require clinical diagnosis. Visiting officers are clerical staff trained to gather data from customers in a sensitive way. They have no medical training.

Visits are terminated if the interview is causing distress to the customer. The Agency may need to re-visit or, alternatively, obtain the information another way. The visiting officer would also terminate enquiries if it appears clear that the person really needs someone to act for them. If the person refused to participate because they claimed to be in a category we have agreed not to contact directly, the visiting officer would withdraw from the interview and make further enquiries.

If BIP enquiries are abandoned before any information has been gathered on a case involving someone in an exempt category, no further action is taken on the case. The position is different, however, if the customer completes the postal questionnaire or provides information to the visiting officer which indicates that benefit may need to be adjusted. Such evidence cannot be ignored but must be referred to the adjudication officer to decide whether a review is appropriate and, if it is, to determine benefit entitlement.

At 31 December 1997, 403 people in exempt categories have been contacted as part of the Project. Of these, no further action has been taken in 350 cases and benefit continues unchanged. Of the remainder, 4 awards have been increased, 34 awards have been reduced and 15 have been disallowed completely.

Of the 34 people whose benefit has been reduced, 16 have asked for a review of their entitlement: in 2 cases benefit has been restored to the previous rate and 14 cases are still under reconsideration. Of the 15 people whose benefit has been disallowed, 14 have asked for a review of entitlement; in 3 cases, benefit has been awarded at a lower rate than the previous award and 11 cases are under reconsideration.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people (a) in the North-West and (b) in Warrington, North have (i) been disallowed benefit and (ii) received increased benefits as a result of the Benefit Integrity Project. [33636]

Mr. Denham: The Benefit Integrity Project aims to ensure that those in receipt of DLA are entitled to it. While it is right to check that people are receiving the correct amount of benefit, we are determined that those checks should be undertaken as sensitively as possible. Also, that we should ensure all decisions taken as a result of the project are right. We have, therefore, acted to introduce an extra safeguard to improve the quality of, and confidence in, benefit decisions made by the Project.

The administration of this programme is a matter for Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend with further details.

Letter from David Riggs to Helen Jones, dated 10 March 1998:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked Peter Mathison to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question concerning how many people (a) in the North West and (b) in Warrington North have (i) been disallowed benefit and (ii) received increased benefits as a result of the Benefit Integrity Project. As Mr. Mathison is away from the office on leave, I am replying.

The information is not available in the format requested. The database of casework has not been designed to extract information geographically during the project. To do so would necessitate high cost and disruption to the processing of ongoing casework. However, once the casework has been completed a full evaluation of the data is planned to provide a geographical analysis.

As at 31 January 1998, 54,839 cases nationally have been examined as part of the BIP. Of the total cases dealt with 1,299 have had their benefit increased, 42,730 have been unchanged, 6,884 have had their benefit reduced and 3,926 have had their benefit stopped. The total includes 10,811 renewal cases; of which 334 had their benefit increased, 5,601 remain unchanged, 2,907 have had their benefit reduced and 1,969 have had their benefit decreased.

A monthly statistical report can be found in the House of Commons library.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many cases involving people who are terminally ill have been reviewed by the Benefit Integrity Project (a) in Warrington, North and (b) nationally. [33637]

Mr. Denham: The administration of the Benefit Integrity Project is a matter for Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend with further details.

Letter from David Riggs to Helen Jones, dated 10 March 1998:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked Peter Mathison to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about how many cases involving people who are terminally ill have been reviewed by the Benefit Integrity Project (a) in Warrington and (b) nationally. As Mr. Mathison is away from the office on leave, I am replying.

The information cannot be provided in the format requested. Information is not routinely provided on a geographical basis because of the disproportionately high costs and the disruption to the processing of current casework.

People in certain groups are not being contacted directly under the Benefit Integrity Project (BIP), provided that it is possible to identify them from their records. They include those paid under the Special Rules arrangements for people who are terminally ill. All such cases can be identified from computer records and no-one in this group has been, or will be, visited or sent a postal enquiry form.

The Special Rules arrangements apply to people who may not live longer than six months because of an illness, although it is, of course, impossible to say exactly how long someone will live. Claims expressly made on these grounds are dealt with more quickly and people are paid the highest rate of the DLA care component immediately, without having to wait three months and without having to establish that they satisfy the disability criteria for that award. These arrangements do not apply to the mobility component.

There are, however, a number of people who are terminally ill but who do not come within the Special Rules definition. Their claims are dealt with in the normal way; entitlement depends on the extent of help they need with personal care and getting around and they are also subject to the three months qualifying and six month prospective tests. People in this situation who are receiving the higher rate of the DLA mobility component with either the middle or higher rate of the care component will be contacted by the BIP.

There are other people receiving these rates of benefit who claimed DLA under normal rules some time ago who are now terminally ill and may come within the Special Rules definition. They would not be identified initially and a postal enquiry form would be issued or a visit made. Visits are, however, concluded if the interview is causing distress to the customer or if the customer maintains that they are terminally ill. The Benefits Agency might need to re-visit or to consider obtaining the information in some other way.

During the course of BIP enquiries, it may become apparent that a customer now comes within the Special Rules definition. If a review could lead to an increase in benefit, they are advised of the evidence required to support a review on those grounds.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Compensation Recovery Unit

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will list the sums recovered by the Compensation Recovery Unit from (a) legally aided claimants and (b) defendants in the case concerned in England and Wales in the last 10 years for which figures are available. [33633]

Mr. Denham: The administration of the Compensation Recovery Unit is a matter for Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. and learned Member.

Letter from David Riggs to Mr. Edward Garnier, dated 10 March 1998:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked Peter Mathison to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking for a list of the sums recovered by the Compensation Recovery Unit from (a) legally aided claimants or (b) defendants in the case concerned in England and Wales in the last 10 years for which figures are available. As Mr. Mathison is away from the office on leave, I am replying.

The information is not available in the format required. The Compensation Recovery Unit is not advised of the situation of the plaintiff and whether or not they are "legally-aided".

As the Compensation Recovery scheme applies to compensation payments made on or after 3 September 1990, there were no monies recovered during the 1989–90 financial year. Details of the amounts recovered in each financial year since 1990 are given in the table below:

Financial year	Amount recovered £ million
1990–91	3.7
1991–92	25.3
1992–93	51.3
1993–94	81.9
1994–95	110.1
1995–96	135.1
1996–97	145.5
1997–8 (to 28.2.98)	153.0

Note:
Figures are provisional and subject to change.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Prisons (Security)

7. Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps her Department is taking to improve security in prisons. [32134]

Mr. Ingram: Security in Northern Ireland prisons is subject to continuous review.

As I advised the House on 21 January 1998, Official Report, column 983, a range of additional security measures have been put in place at the Maze Prison.

Further to this, as the House will be aware, an Inquiry, independent of the Northern Ireland Prison Service, was set up to report on the recent serious incidents at the Maze. That Inquiry has been completed and will be published soon.

Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons will also be undertaking a formal inspection of the Maze and his report will also be published.

Peace Process

8. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on the current peace talks. [32135]

20. Mr. Savidge: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress is being made in the multi-party talks in Northern Ireland. [32149]

Marjorie Mowlam: I refer my hon. Friends to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Dr. Turner) earlier today.

9. Mrs. Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement about the role of women in the peace process. [32137]

Marjorie Mowlam: Women have played a vital role in bringing the peace process this far, both in politics and in civic society. There is a vibrant network of women's groups working to promote a peaceful society and one in which all traditions are respected. They are to be commended.

14. Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the European Union has taken to support the peace process in Northern Ireland. [32143]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The European Union is funding the Special Support Programme for Peace and Reconciliation which aims to reinforce progress towards a peaceful and stable society and to promote reconciliation in Northern Ireland. Additional EU aid for the Programme was recently announced for 1998 bringing the total awarded to 320 mecu, about £220 million.

18. Mr. McWalter: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions there have been in the multi-party talks concerning measures to build confidence in the peace process in Northern Ireland. [32147]

Marjorie Mowlam: The whole talks process is designed to secure a political agreement which will build confidence throughout the Northern Ireland community. A particular sub-committee on confidence-building measures has had eight meetings to discuss elements identified in the Report of the International Body as needing to be addressed as part of building confidence in the political process.

25. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on the process of exclusion from, and re-admission to, the peace negotiations in respect of political parties in Northern Ireland. [32154]

Marjorie Mowlam: The Government have made it clear that they wish to see a fully inclusive talks process but that participation in the negotiations is dependent upon total and absolute commitment to the Mitchell principles of democracy and non-violence. Any party which demonstrably dishonours those principles is no longer entitled to participate in the negotiations. Both the UDP and Sinn Fein have been excluded from the negotiations on that basis in recent weeks.

The two Governments said, in relation to both parties, that if, over time, a complete, unequivocal and unqualified ceasefire were demonstrated and established through words and deeds to have been fully and continuously observed by the organisations with which they were linked, they would be eligible to rejoin the negotiations.

The Governments also noted, on the exclusion of Sinn Fein on 20 February, that this approach could not be maintained in the event of further violence by the organisations linked to these parties. All parties should have no doubt about the two Governments' resolve in such circumstances.

Police Complaints Procedure

10. Ms Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on plans for a new independent police complaints procedure in Northern Ireland. [32138]

Mr. Ingram: The Police (Northern Ireland) Bill, which is currently before this House, contains new provisions on police complaints. These will give effect to a new radical system in Northern Ireland by the establishment of an independent Police Ombudsman.

Company Closures

11. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on the impact of recent trends in company closures on the Northern Ireland economy. [32139]

26. Mr. Cranston: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on the effects of recent company closures on the Northern Ireland economy. [32155]

Mr. Ingram: Any company closures are very much to be regretted and officials are working with industry to try to alleviate the worst effects. However, recent investment announcements, such as Fujitsu, Galen Holdings and Sean Quinn, demonstrate the continuing confidence in Northern Ireland as a location for internationally competitive companies.

Local Government

12. Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on the progress her Department is making towards increasing the range of duties and responsibilities accorded to local government in Northern Ireland. [32140]

Marjorie Mowlam: If widely acceptable arrangements can be agreed, it is the Government's intention to transfer a wide range of responsibilities to new democratically elected institutions in Northern Ireland. The Government have no plans for radical change to the role and responsibilities of District Councils in Northern Ireland.

Literacy and Numeracy

13. Mr. Touhig: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proposals she has for improving literacy and numeracy standards in Northern Ireland schools. [32142]

Mr. Worthington: On 27 February, I launched the Northern Ireland School Improvement Programme, which sets out the Government's plans to raise standards, including literacy and numeracy. This includes additional support staff, enhanced teacher training, target setting, best practice guidance, summer schemes and after-school clubs. A copy will be placed in the Library.

Inward Investment

15. Mr. Hope: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment her Department has made of the current inward investment potential of Northern Ireland. [32144]

Mr. Ingram: The Industrial Development Board for Northern Ireland regularly reviews the investment potential of Northern Ireland. It also seeks to ensure that the competitive advantage Northern Ireland offers as a profitable location for investment is made clear to world class companies. That message is fully understood by the increasing number of investors establishing projects in Northern Ireland.

Grammar Schools

16. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government on the future of grammar schools in Northern Ireland. [32145]

Mr. Worthington: The Government have no plans to change the structure of secondary school provision in Northern Ireland but are commissioning research on the impact of selection on standards at all levels. Careful consideration will be given to any local proposals for change which have the support of parents and meet the objectives of improved standards and better value for money. As in Great Britain, pupils should be educated in accordance with the wishes of their parents, in so far as this is compatible with the provision of efficient instruction and training and the avoidance of unreasonable public expenditure.

After-school Clubs

17. Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on the development of after-school homework clubs and literacy and numeracy clubs in Northern Ireland. [32146]

23. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans she has for the expansion of health and education services outside school hours for young people in Northern Ireland. [32152]

Mr. Worthington: People's Lottery Funding will be used to support a range of initiatives in education, health and the environment. This will be managed by a new body called the New Opportunities Fund which is due to be created during 1998 to support a range of after school activities under the heading of the Out of School Activities Initiative.

The New Opportunities Fund will receive a share of People's Lottery funding for the period 1999 to 2001 to support projects which offer out of school hours activities which have a learning focus, with funding likely to be available for project applications from April 1999. The arrangements for the operation of the New Opportunities Fund, Out of School Activities Initiative are still at an early stage of development; however, it has been agreed that Northern Ireland will receive 4.5 per cent. of the £200 million allocated to support projects across the United Kingdom.

Decommissioning

19. Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made in decommissioning illegal firearms. [32148]

27. Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made in achieving the decommissioning of illegal weapons by terrorist groups in Northern Ireland. [32156]

Mr. Ingram: Based on the proposals of the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning the two Governments submitted draft schemes to the talks liaison sub-committee on Decommissioning on 25 February. A draft order under section 2 of the Northern Ireland Arms Decommissioning Act 1997 enabling a scheme to identify an amnesty period was laid on 2 March and will be debated by both Houses.

It is important that all the mechanisms which would enable voluntary decommissioning to take place are completed in fulfilment of the two Governments' commitment to the total disarmament of all paramilitary weapons on the basis of the Report of the International Body. We recognise decommissioning of the kind envisaged will be a voluntary activity. Both Governments have said that they see the resolution of the decommissioning issue as an indispensable part of the negotiations. It is now for those in possession of illegal arms to take this important confidence building step.

Security Situation

21. Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement about the security situation in Northern Ireland. [32150]

Mr. Ingram: In recent weeks there have been a number of terrorist incidents. The Government deplore these attacks, in particular the appalling murders of Mr. Allen and Mr. Trainor at Poyntzpass on 3 March. These attacks are designed to de-rail the talks process and those who carry them out are working against the majority of the people in Northern Ireland who clearly want peace. The Government are determined they will not succeed.

Parades

22. Mr. Pound: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on progress to help reduce tensions over disputed parades in Northern Ireland. [32151]

Mr. Ingram: As my hon. Friend will know, the Public Processions (Northern Ireland) Act 1998 is now is force. The Act is designed to tackle the difficulties that have surrounded the parades issue in Norther Ireland in recent years, by establishing the Parades Commission as an independent body with a remit to encourage and facilitate local accommodation on contentious parades. Where this is not possible, the Commission will have power to make legally binding determinations on such parades, which may include conditions as to numbers, route etc.

Paramilitary Organisations

24. Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment she has received from the security forces as to the paramilitary organisations responsible for the murder of Kevin Conway and the bombings of Moira and Portadown. [32153]

Mr. Ingram: The RUC consider that the Continuity Army Council were responsible for the bombings in Moira and Portadown.

The RUC have not been able to reach a firm view that the murder of Kevin Conway (whose body was found on 18 February) was authorised by the IRA leadership. However, it is the RUC's assessment that local IRA elements were involved in the murder, although no charges have yet been brought.

Following the murders of Brendan Campbell and Robert Dougan, the two Governments decided on 20 February that Sinn Fein should not be allowed to participate in the Talks. The subsequent RUC assessment in connection with Mr. Conway's murder underlines why the Governments were right to take the action we did.

The press notice issued by the two Governments on 20 February made it clear that the invitation to Sinn Fein to return to the Talks from 9 March could not be issued in the event of further violence by the IRA; and that a similar approach would be taken in the event of further violence by organisations linked to other parties in the Talks.

The Governments indicated on 6 March, in confirming their invitation to Sinn Fein to rejoin, that they were now satisfied that the IRA ceasefire was being observed.

Postal and Proxy Votes

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications for postal and proxy votes were received for the Mid-Ulster constituency in the 1997 parliamentary election; how many of these applications were rejected; and for what reasons. [31660]

Marjorie Mowlam: The only statistics available for absent voting for the Mid-Ulster constituency are for the number of approved applications recorded by the Deputy Returning Officer. This is because all applications (whether allowed or not) received for the Parliamentary Elections 1 May 1997, Local Government Elections 21 May 1997 and elections to the Forum in May 1996 were amalgamated at the Electoral Office headquarters after the Local Elections in 1997 to enable a comparative analysis of applications to attempt to identify the apparent level of absent vote abuse. The figures for the Mid-Ulster constituency are as follows:

	Number
Postal Votes allowed	3,609
Proxies allowed	1,440
Total	5,049

The determination of the number of such applications disallowed would require the manual checking through all the applications processed for Mid-Ulster and a significant number of applications are still with the police. Therefore, at this stage it is not possible to give figures for the number of applications received and rejected.

Likewise, figures do not exist which outline the reasons why applications for absent votes were rejected in Mid-Ulster. However, there is a breakdown of such information for Norther Ireland as a whole and this is set out in the table:

Parliamentary Election—1 May 1997

Reason	Number
Applicant not registered elector	320
Received too late	300
Insufficient or no reason	162
Dual/treble attestation	126
Not attested or not properly attested	145
Not signed	66
Medical reason, non-physical illness	98
Medical (not properly completed)	64
Proxy information not completed	9
Letters returned by Post Office	5
Signature not accepted	3
Too late, received after "late" closing date	3
No date of election given	2
Miscellaneous	115
Total	1,418

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what investigations the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland carried out after the 1997 parliamentary election to assess the validity of postal and proxy votes cast; and how many of the postal and proxy votes cast in the Mid-Ulster constituency, following these inquiries, were considered to be potentially fraudulent. [31659]

Marjorie Mowlam: The Chief Electoral Officer conducted a comparative analysis of a wide sample of absent vote applications across Northern Ireland for 1 May 1996 Elections, 1 May 1997 General Election and 21 May 1997 Local Government Elections. Applications were sorted alphabetically within wards. This enabled a comparison of forms from each applicant which highlighted any trends in handwriting, conflicting reasons or attestations over the same and adjoining geographical areas and from one election to the next.

The comparative study carried out by the CEO was on a Northern Ireland wide basis and only a sample of wards were investigated, with some Mid-Ulster wards among them. It is therefore impossible to state how many applications were considered fraudulent for the Mid-Ulster constituency. The examination did indicate irregularities in applications for Northern Ireland as a whole.

Primary Schools

Mr. MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many spaces there were on 1 January, or at the latest available date, in education board primary schools. [32560]

Mr. Worthington: At October 1966, there were just over 94,000 places available in Controlled (Education and Library Board) Primary Schools in Northern Ireland. Of these, some 20,500 were unfilled.

Tourist Board

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the grant-in-aid to the Northern Ireland Tourist Board in (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98 and (c) 1998–99. [33507]

Mr. Ingram: The Northern Ireland Tourist Board receives Grant from the Department of Economic Development under the provisions of the Tourism (Northern Ireland) Order 1992. During 1996–97, NITB received a grant of £14,165 million from DED; in 1997–98 it received £14,037 million; and in 1998–99 it will receive a grant of £13,484 million.

Employment Equality

Mr. Fitzpatrick: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when she proposes to respond to the report from the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights, Employment Equality: Building for the Future. [34006]

Mr. Worthington: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has presented to Parliament today a White Paper, "Partnership for Equality", which set out the Government's proposals for future legislation and policies on employment equality in Norther Ireland. This White Paper responds to the recommendations made in SACHR's report of June 1997.

Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to her answer of 12 February 1998, Official Report, column 321, if she will place in the Library her full response to the 22nd Annual Report of the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights. [32810]

Marjorie Mowlam: Yes. My full response to the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights 22nd Annual Report has been placed in the libraries of both Houses.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Fishing Industry

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to the answer of 2 March 1998, Official Report, column 496, on what date he and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland will meet the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations and the Scottish Fishermen's Federation. [33611]

Mr. Morley: We are in contact with the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations and Scottish Fishermen's Federation to agree a mutually convenient date.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will arrange a meeting with South West fishermen at which civil servants would not be present. [33917]

Mr. Morley: No such meeting has been requested by South West fishermen.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will be publishing his guidance note to producer organisations on the uptake of effort. [32183]

Dr. John Cunningham: Copies were placed in the Library of the House on 4 March, together with details of the provisional effort allocations as already presented to the industry. These figures are being revised in the light of further information provided by the industry, and, as my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary has already explained to my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Ms Osborne) on 24 February 1998, Official Report, columns 187–88, these allocations will need to be further reviewed as definitive information about activity in 1997 becomes available.

Oxtail Soup

Mr. Luff: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he plans to provide definitive guidance on the consumption and safety of oxtail soup; and if he will make a statement. [31879]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 27 February 1998]: I assume the hon. Member is concerned about the consumption and safety of oxtail soup following the introduction of the Beef Bones Regulations 1997, in the light of advice from SEAC and the Chief Medical Officer about BSE infectivity being found in dorsal root ganglia (DRG) and also, possibly, in bone marrow. Oxtail soup can continue to be manufactured and sold in Great Britain because the processes involved in commercial production of such soup comply with the requirements of the Beef Bones Regulations and are considered not to involve any risk of BSE infectivity. Preparation of oxtail soup by restaurateurs and others for sale direct to the ultimate consumer is, however, prohibited under Regulation 3(2).

Live Animal Exports

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the impact of the additional costs of slaughtering and rendering animals in the United Kingdom on the likely levels of exports of live animals. [33005]

Mr. Rooker: Live beef exports from the United Kingdom are currently banned. Any additional costs of slaughtering and rendering sheep in the United Kingdom are unlikely to have any significant impact on the level of live sheep exports. Price levels, transport costs and the value of sterling against other European currencies are far more significant factors in determining the level of live sheep exports.

Veal

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for what reasons the early marketing payment scheme for veal is not applied in the United Kingdom. [33730]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 10 March 1998]: We do not consider that the Early Marketing Scheme is achieving its objective of reducing beef production by encouraging slaughter at lower weights, or that the scheme is cost-effective. Moreover, the small scale of our veal industry would make the burden of administration disproportionate.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to ban under Article 36 of the Treaty of Rome the import of veal from EU countries where veal crates have been used. [33646]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 10 March 1998]: Although the use of the narrow veal crate has been banned in the UK since 1990, the system is still used in many other member states, under EU legislation which permits this until 31 December 2006. Our legal advice is that Article 36 of the Treaty of Rome cannot be used to ban imports of veal that have been legally produced in these member states. We are currently awaiting a judgment of the European Court of Justice as to whether Article 36 would allow us to ban the export of calves to be reared in crates. When this judgment is available we shall need to consider whether it enables us to change our view of what action is open to us under Article 36.

Ear Tagging

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will delay the date for ear-tagging under the Cattle Identification Regulations to 1 April. [33728]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 10 March 1998]: The proposed Cattle Identification Regulations 1998 are not expected to come into force until April.

Pigs

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he will take to ensure that the rules relating to the treatment of pigs in other EU countries are (a) as strict and (b) as well enforced as in the United Kingdom. [33727]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 10 March 1998]: During the forthcoming review of Directive 91/630, which lays down minimum welfare requirements for pigs, the Government will seek to raise EU standards at least to match those that already apply in the UK. Ensuring that other member states properly enforce EU requirements is a matter for the European Commission. We will pass on, for their attention, any evidence submitted to us on non-compliance in other Member States.

Central Science Laboratory

Mr. Charles Clarke: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish in full the independent management consultancy advice which informed the 1996 prior options review of the Central Science Laboratory. [33982]

Mr. Rooker: Management consultancy reports are provided by private sector advisers on a confidential basis. It would not therefore be appropriate to publish this advice in full.

Mr. Charles Clarke: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish his Department's estimates of the proportion of full capacity utilisation of offices and laboratories at the Central Science Laboratory, Sand Hutton, York, which is currently under-utilised. [33983]

Mr. Rooker: The Central Science Laboratory at Sand Hutton, York was designed to accommodate approximately 400 fee-earning scientists. There are presently 300 fee-earning scientists based at the laboratory and although the laboratories and offices are occupied, they are currently under-utilised.

Mr. Charles Clarke: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much income is projected to be received by the Central Science Laboratory in the 1997–98 financial year from research contracts based primarily at Sand Hutton, York, from (a) his Department, (b) other public sector agencies and (c) private companies. [33984]

Mr. Rooker: Projected income for 1997–98 from research contracts primarily based at Sand Hutton, York is set out in the table.

Sector	£ million
MAFF	16.8
Other public agencies	0.6
Private sector	1.8
Total	19.2

Mr. Charles Clarke: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the annual overhead costs of the Central Science Laboratory site at Sand Hutton, York in 1997–98. [33986]

Mr. Rooker: Annual overhead costs for the Central Science Laboratory site at Sand Hutton, York are projected to be £5.7m for 1997–98.

Mr. Charles Clarke: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the number of non-scientific staff employed in 1997–98 at the Central Science Laboratory site at Sand Hutton, York. [33987]

Mr. Rooker: A total of 120 non-scientific staff are employed at the Central Science Laboratory site at Sand Hutton, York in 1997–98, to provide library, financial, IT, human resources and other services for both the Norwich and the York sites.

Food (Chemical Contamination)

Mr. Charles Clarke: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in respect of how many incidents regarding chemical contamination of food, his Department has required laboratory analysis during the last 10 years; and where the work was carried out. [33981]

Mr. Rooker: The Department maintains an extensive programme of surveys for many types of chemical contaminants in food. Inevitably, it is necessary to undertake investigations into specific incidents when elevated levels of contaminants are found. These investigations are carried out at a number of public and private laboratories, including the Central Science Laboratory (CSL), York for pesticide residues and the CSL, Norwich for other chemicals such as dioxins and PCBs. The information is not held in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, details on an annual basis are contained in the Annual Report on Food Chemical Surveillance; the second Annual Report is due to be published in early summer.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Paul Wells

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Indian Government concerning the missing hostage Paul Wells. [33290]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The most recent FCO Ministerial exchange with the Indian Government on the Kashmir kidnapping took place on 2 March, when my noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Baroness Symons, emphasised our continuing concerns with the Indian High Commissioner.

My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, Ministers and senior Foreign Office officials raise the plight of Paul Wells, and Keith Mangan, the other British hostage in Kashmir, at every opportunity. During the State Visit to India and Pakistan in October 1997 my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary discussed the kidnappings with Indian Prime Minister Gujral and other senior figures in both countries. Together with the Governments of the other kidnap victims, we also remain in close touch at an operational level with the Indian and Pakistani authorities charged with resolving the case.

Export Licences

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applications for export licences were circulated to his Department by the Export Control Organisation during each of the four week periods beginning (i) 3 May 1997, (ii) 31 May 1997, (iii) 28 June 1997, (iv) 26 July 1997, (v) 23 August 1997, (vi) 20 September 1997, (vii) 18 October 1997, (viii) 15 November 1997, (ix) 13 December 1997, (x) 10 January 1998 and (xi) 7 February 1998. [33373]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Details of the recorded number of licence applications for strategic export received by the FCO from the Export Control Organisation during each of the specified four week periods are as follows:

Week commencing	Total
3 May 1997	545
31 May 1997	669
28 June 1997	598
26 July 1997	709
23 August 1997	592
20 September 1997	593
18 October 1997	671
15 November 1997	696
13 December 1997	432
10 January 1998	669
7 February 1998	744

Turkey

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he will take at the forthcoming conference on European enlargement to improve Turkish/EU relations and to make provision for Turkey to be among the group of countries making active preparations for EU membership. [33699]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The Luxembourg Council in December 1997 decided that Turkey was eligible to participate in the European Conference. The Turkish Government have decided not to attend the inaugural meeting of the Conference on 12 March, but I hope they will join us at future events.

The Luxembourg Council also agreed to develop a strategy to help prepare Turkey for accession by bringing it closer to the European Union in every field. I welcome the Commission's proposals for taking this forward. I hope they can be implemented as quickly as possible.

Publications

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those European Commission (a) newsletters, (b) magazines and (c) occasional publications to which his Department subscribes. [33659]

Mr. Fatchett: European Commission publications cannot always be easily distinguished from European Communities publications. This department subscribes to the following regular publications of the European Commission/European Communities:

Nigeria

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will make it his policy to urge the Nigerian Government to release the former Nigerian President, General Olusegun Obasanjo; [33614]

(2) what recent representations he has received regarding the former Nigerian head of state, General Olusegun Obasanjo. [33613]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We receive regular representations on behalf of the former Nigerian Head of State, General Olusegun Obasanjo. We remain deeply concerned about him and other political prisoners held in Nigeria. With our EU and Commonwealth partners we have called frequently for his early release and for that of all political prisoners.

Human Rights

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East (Dr. Kumar) of 3 July 1997, Official Report, column 221, when he plans to publish the conclusions of his review of those international human rights instruments to which the United Kingdom is not yet party. [33301]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We expect to complete the review this summer.

British Prisoners of War

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to press for further (a) apologies and (b) compensation from the Japanese for the treatment of British prisoners of war. [33650]

Mr. Fatchett: The Japanese Prime Minister, Mr. Ryutaro Hashimoto, made a formal apology on behalf of his Government for the ill-treatment of the British prisoners of war to the Prime Minister in January. He subsequently repeated this apology direct to the British people via an article in a major British newspaper.

Since taking office last May, we have held a series of high-level discussions with the Japanese Government on ways to help the former prisoners of war. Throughout these talks, the Japanese Government referred to the 1951 San Francisco Peace Treaty which legally settled the question of compensation at governmental level. It is clear that there is no prospect of a new round of compensation.

Mr. Thomas Bufton

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the Antiguan authorities on behalf of Mr. Thomas Bufton. [33689]

Mr. Fatchett: No representations have been made to the Antiguan authorities on behalf of Mr. Bufton. He has been charged with attempted murder. This is a matter for the courts. Mr. Bufton has engaged a lawyer to act on his behalf.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if UK representatives were present at the committal hearing of Mr. Thomas Bufton in Antigua on 23 February. [33688]

Mr. Fatchett: Yes. The Consular Assistant at the British High Commission in Antigua attended the committal hearing of Mr. Thomas Bufton on 23 February.

Kosovo

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his recent visit to Belgrade; and what discussions he (a) has had and (b) has planned with his counterparts in Macedonia and Albania in respect of the crisis in Kosovo. [33877]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: On my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary's visit to Belgrade, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer he gave to the hon. Member for Westbury (Mr. Faber) on 9 March 1998, Official Report, column 550. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary telephoned Prime Minister Nano of Albania and President Gligorov of Macedonia on 9 March to report on the outcome of that day's Contact Group Ministerial in London on Kosovo. I shall visit both countries on 11 March for more detailed discussions.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Drinking Water

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will enable the Drinking Water Inspectorate to seek authorisation for a wider range of remedial works before a failure occurs. [33034]

Angela Eagle: Water companies have a duty to supply drinking water which is wholesome and it is for each company to decide how to maintain their assets to avoid future breaches of the standards. If water fails to meet quality standards, the Drinking Water Inspectorate will take enforcement action against the company, or prosecute them for supplying water unfit for human consumption.

Government Car Service

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the cost of leasing the Jaguar 4.0i LWB for the use of the Deputy Prime Minister from the Government Car Service. [32992]

Angela Eagle [holding answer 5 March 1998]: The current weekly cost to the Department of leasing the car and a full-time driver from the Government Car Service is £1,185. The car is not provided for the exclusive use of the Deputy Prime Minister but undertakes other activities, such as the delivery of urgent papers and Ministerial boxes. The basis on which the leasing costs are determined are the same as those which applied to the previous Administration and apply similarly to the current arrangements under which the Government Car Service provides a car for the use of the Leader of the Opposition.

Science, Engineering and Technology Week

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what contribution his Department plans to make to the Government's National Week of Science, Engineering and Technology on 13 to 22 March, in respect of environmental and clean-technology research. [33028]

Angela Eagle: Research teams and scientists currently working under contract to the Department's Research Programmes will be taking part on their own initiatives but with the encouragement of the Department, in National Science, Engineering and Technology Week events. The Foresight Vehicle programme, to which the Department contributes support, is one clean-technology project that will be on display.

Publications

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list those European Commission (a) newsletters, (b) magazines and (c) occasional publications to which his Department subscribes. [33658]

Angela Eagle: The Department including its Executive Agencies subscribes to a range of titles; currently the main ones are:

(a) Newsletters

(b) Magazines

Bulletin of the European Union, including supplements

Household Projections

Mr. Tom King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will review how the migration assumptions used in the sub-national population and household projections are calculated, in respect of the emphasis laid on forecasts of future regional and sub-regional economic activity rather than past trends. [33827]

Mr. Raynsford: The 1996-based sub-national population projections are due to be published in the autumn of this year. Production of the household projections will follow some months later. As in the past, local authorities will be consulted on the migration assumptions within the population projections. At a consultation meeting last December, local government and academic representatives supported the view that both the population and household projections should be based on past trends. It should be noted that regional economic factors are taken into account alongside the household projections when deciding on appropriate housing figures for Regional Planning Guidance.

Mr. Tom King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he intends that regional planning conferences should start producing the annual reports on indicators relevant to housing provision proposed in paragraph 31 of Planning for the Communities of the Future (Cm 3885). [33822]

Mr. Raynsford: As explained in paragraphs 33 and 34 of the document, the Government wish to implement the new arrangements as quickly as possible. When RPG is already under review the Government office will discuss with the Regional Planning Conferences the scope for adopting the new approach in completing those reviews. Arrangements for monitoring would be a feature of those discussions. Additionally, the Department intends shortly to publish advice on monitoring indicators.

Mr. Tom King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to make chairmen of county structure plan examinations in public, who have not yet finalised their reports, aware of the policy and priority changes proposed in "Planning for the Communities of the Future" (Cm 3885). [33823]

Mr. Raynsford: As a matter of Departmental policy, all those who serve as Chairmen of structure plan Examinations in Public are sent copies of new national planning policy statements and guidance when they are published. This includes copies of "Planning for the Communities of the Future", though it should be noted that some elements of that document are, or will be, the subject of public consultation before being finalised.

Mr. Tom King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will define local ownership of the housing figures as referred to in paragraph 25 of "Planning for the Communities of the Future" (Cm 3885). [33828]

Mr. Raynsford: As explained in "Planning for the Communities of the Future" the new system will make local authorities more responsible for assessing their housing requirements, in partnership with the Government Offices, and more accountable for the results. This should increase their sense of ownership of the resulting housing figures.

Mr. Tom King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has to implement the provisions of (a) paragraph 76, in respect of low density greenfield development and (b) paragraph 86, in respect of a mix of size of housing units to reflect increasing demand by small households, of "Planning for the Communities of the Future" (Cm 3885). [33821]

Mr. Raynsford: Current planning policy guidance (PPG3) already enables local planning authorities to seek a reasonable mix and balance of house types and sizes to cater for a range of housing needs. Nevertheless, as the policy document "Planning for the Communities of the Future" indicates, PPG3 needs to be revised to bring it up to date. The Government's policies on housing density issues will also be considered as part of that review. We hope to issue a draft PPG3 for consultation by the summer recess.

Mr. Tom King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he intends to publish detailed advice and requirements on how the sustainability appraisal of draft regional planning guidance on housing projections, proposed in paragraph 28 of "Planning for the Communities of the Future" (Cm 3885) will be implemented. [33826]

Mr. Raynsford: As indicated in the consultation paper on the future of Regional Planning Guidance (RPG), published on 15 January, when copies were placed in the Library, the intention is that future reviews of RPG will be subject to a full environmental appraisal. However, it goes on to say that we are also considering the scope to move towards a more broadly based "sustainability appraisal" of RPG. We will be letting a research project in May to determine how best to undertake a sustainability appraisal of RPG and produce good practice guidance on undertaking such an appraisal. It is intended to publish the results of the research in March 1999.

Mr. Tom King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has for a public information campaign on the issues involved in the projections for and planning of new homes; and how much he plans to spend on this in (a) the current year and (b) subsequently. [33824]

Mr. Raynsford: These issues continue to be well-aired in public debate. In addition, my right hon. and hon. Friends and I will be making speeches, and my Department will be organising meetings, over the coming months, in connection with the recently published policy document, "Planning for the Communities of the Future" (Cm 3885). We do not, at this stage, see a need for a paid public information campaign.

Rail Freight

Sir Raymond Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has held with Railtrack on the (a) sale of land and (b) retention of land for future rail freight terminals. [33672]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My right hon. Friend has met Railtrack on a number of occasions to discuss a variety of railway issues, including the sale of land and the need to encourage the development of the rail freight market. We are considering what measures are necessary to safeguard and further develop future rail freight opportunities as part of our integrated transport strategy.

Sir Raymond Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what obligations have been imposed on Railtrack to encourage rail freight. [33700]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Railtrack's obligations to its freight customers are contained in track access contracts which are approved by the Rail Regulator.

Fishing Industry

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. George) of 3 March 1998, Official Report, column 546, on the fishing industry, what estimate he has made of the costs of implementing the EC Directives on health and safety; and if he will list the directives concerned. [33889]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I have asked the Chief Executive of the Marine Safety Agency, Mr. Robin Bradley, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from R. M. Bradley to Sir Richard Body, dated 12 March 1998:

The Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions has asked me to reply to your question about the costs of implementing the EC Directives on health and safety for fishing vessels. I attach a complete list of the EC directives on occupational health and safety, all of which apply to fishing vessels although some will have minimal effect.

The Merchant Shipping and Fishing Vessels (Health and Safety at Work) Regulations 1997 (S.I. 1997/2962), which come into force on 31 march, implement three EC directives:

Council Directive 89/391/EC—the "Framework directive";

Council Directive 91/383/EC—the "temporary workers directive"; and Council Directive 92/85/EC—the "pregnant workers directive".

A Compliance Cost Assessment (CCA) was published with the draft regulations at public consultation stage, as is standard procedure for new regulations which have cost implications for businesses, charities or voluntary organisations. A copy has been placed in the House of Commons library. The CCA shows estimated set up costs between £400 and £1,000 per vessel, and ongoing costs of between £300 and £800 per vessel per year—this however is considered to be very much a worst case estimate.

Work is in progress to implement three further daughter directives:

Council Directive 93/103—the "fishing vessels" directive;

Council Directive 90/269—the "manual handling" directive; and Council Directive 94/33/EC—the "young workers" directive.

Fishing Vessels Directive

In order to implement the fishing vessels directive, amendments are due to be made to:

Fishing Vessel (Safety Provisions) Rules 1975

Fishing Vessel (Life Saving Appliances) Regulations 1988

Merchant Shipping (Fishing Vessel) Crew Accommodation Regulations 1975.

Many of the provisions of the directive are already required by existing domestic regulations for vessels of 24m and over. The amendments will extend those provisions to new vessels of 15m and over with immediate effect and to existing vessels of 18m and over from November 2002. Currently there are some 850 existing vessels of 18m and over. A CCA was published at public consultation stage. This gives a worst case estimate for set up costs of £15,400 per new vessel and £11,700 per existing vessel, with recurring costs of £2,500 per vessel.

Manual Handling Directive

Public consultation is now in progress on regulations to implement the manual handling directive. Our initial view is that there will be no compliance costs additional to those already identified for the framework directive.

Young Workers Directive

Draft regulations are being prepared to implement the young workers directive and we are seeking advice from industry on the likely compliance costs of those provisions which apply to fishing vessels.

Work on implementing the remaining daughter directives, which in each case will include consideration of the compliance costs in consultation with industry, will proceed in due course.

EC OHS Directives:

89/391/EEC Framework Directive

The daughter directives

89/655/EEC Use of Work Equipment

89/656/EEC Personal Protective Equipment

90/269/EEC Manual Handling

90/394/EEC Carcinogens

90/679/EEC Biological Agents

91/383/EEC Temporary Workers

92/58/EEC Safety Signs

92/85/EEC Pregnant Workers

93/103/EEC Fishing Vessels

94/33/EEC Young Persons.

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate the Government's liability under the rules governing the Private Finance Initiative in respect of London and Continental Railways Channel Tunnel Rail Link. [33905]

Ms Glenda Jackson: London and Continental Railways raised some £430 million of debt to fund the Development of the CTRL and Eurostar operations for the period up to the main fund raising for construction. If LCR were to fail then the Eurostar business, along with all of its assets and liabilities including this debt, would transfer back into public ownership. The funding agreements with the lending banks provide for the debt to be repaid from Eurostar revenues.

Fertilisers

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his policy on the imposition of taxes on fertilisers. [33738]

Angela Eagle [holding answer 10 March 1998]: The Government issued a discussion paper 'Economics Instruments for Water Pollution' in November 1997. This included consideration of some possible uses of economic instruments to help reduce the environmental impact of nutrients, including a charge on chemical fertilisers. We are currently considering the responses to the paper.

European Documents

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will arrange for European (a) Commission and (b) Parliament documents, due to be discussed by Ministerial Council meetings during the United Kingdom presidency, which have environmental implications, to be placed in the Library 10 working days before the appropriate Ministerial Council meeting. [33974]

Angela Eagle: In accordance with House of Commons Standing Order 143 which governs the operation of the Select Committee on European Legislation, a range of European Community documents is deposited in Parliament for consideration by that committee. This includes European Commission proposals for Council legislation and other policy documents, such as Commission communications, reports and consultation papers submitted to the Council of Ministers. These are available from the Vote Office and the Library of the House; and the vast majority are deposited at least 10 working days before they are considered by the Council of Ministers. The Government provide an explanatory memorandum on all these documents, commenting on the policy implications including environmental implications.

Roads Review

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will place in the Library the new appraisal criteria to be used in respect of the proposals currently being submitted from regional offices to the Roads Review. [33880]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The new appraisal framework which we are developing to help us determine the new trunk road investment programme uses our previously published criteria of integration, accessibility, safety, economy and environmental impact. We expect to publish further details with the report of the Roads Review later this year.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list those parliamentary questions he has taken eight weeks or more to answer since 1 May 1997. [32708]

Angela Eagle: None.

Anglia Railways

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will make a statement on the value of the rolling stock leased by Anglia Railways which was supplied by Eversholt, Angel Train Contracts and Porterbrook; [34035]

(2) how much public money Anglia Railways spent on leasing rolling stock from Eversholt, Angel Train Contracts and Porterbrook. [34036]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Anglia Railways receives fixed subsidy from the Franchising Director of £35.9 million in the 1997/98 financial year, progressively declining to £6.3 million in 2003/04. What costs they incur in meeting their service obligations under their franchise agreement and how these costs are met are matters for the Company. The value of the relevant rolling stock is a matter for the owners.

Single Regeneration Budget Bids

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received regarding Round IV SRB bids. [33401]

Angela Eagle: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received several representations in support of Single Regeneration Budget (SRB) Challenge Fund Round 4 bids.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to make announcements regarding Single Regeneration Budget Round IV bids. [33400]

Angela Eagle: We expect to announce the successful Round 4 bids shortly.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he has taken to ensure that bids from non-conurbation localities which have areas of multiple deprivation comparable with conurbation areas can compete on equal terms in respect of SRB Challenge Fund. [33402]

Angela Eagle: The Government's supplementary guidance for Round 4 of the Single Regeneration Budget Challenge Fund issued in July 1997 stated:

"Although the emphasis should be on tackling need which is substantial in scale and intensity, the Government recognises that isolated pockets of severe need may require action."

This guidance has, on initial analysis, been reflected in the final bids submitted under Round 4.

Accidents (Unqualified Electricians)

Mr. Kemp: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many accidents resulting from faulty work by non-qualified electricians have been recorded by the Health and Safety Executive in the last three years. [33513]

Angela Eagle: Accurate, comprehensive information in the form requested is not available. HSE publishes general figures for electrical accidents in its annual publication Health and Safety Statistics 1996–97. The figures for the last 3 years are:

Injuries involving contact with electricity or an electrical discharge 1994–95 to 1996–97[1]

Year	Fatal	Major	Over 3 day	Total
1994–95	14	296	614	924
1995–96	17	305	608	930
1996–97[1]	16	224	582	822

[1] Provisional.

Notes:

1. As reported to all health and safety enforcing authorities.
2. 1996–97 injury figures, except fatalities, cannot be directly compared to previous years as they were reported under the new RIDDOR 95 regulations.

Cardiff Bay Barrage

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what estimate he has made of the percentage of the United Kingdom (a) dunlin and (b) redshank over-wintering population covered by conservation agreements in connection with the agreements signed with the European Commission Environmental Protection Directorate at the time of approval for the Cardiff Bay Barrage; and if he will make a statement; [34173]

(2) what was the timetable agreed in undertakings given to the Environmental Protection Directorate of the European Commission at the time of the approval for the Cardiff Bay Barrage for the establishment of conservation agreements for habitats of (a) dunlin and (b) redshank expressed as a percentage of the over-wintering populations in any one year. [34174]

Angela Eagle: When the UK Government agreed compensatory measures for the loss of Cardiff Bay with the European Commission, it was estimated that some 80 per cent. of dunlin and 85 per cent. of redshank wintering populations would be covered by the eventual UK network of Special Protection Areas (SPAs) classified under the EU Birds Directive. There was no agreed timetable. We now know that the original population estimates, which were calculated using the total of the peak mean counts for the major sites identified in the UK's preliminary list of potential SPAs, as a percentage of the UK total wintering populations for both species, were too high. According to the most recent count data available (January 1996), 58 per cent. of all counted dunlin and 42 per cent. of counted redshank were on classified SPAs. Revised figures show that the completed SPA network will eventually cover 63 per cent. of the wintering dunlin and 48 per cent. of the wintering redshank populations. The European Commission has been informed of these revised figures.

Planning Procedures

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to review the Outline Planning Permission procedure and system; and if he will make a statement. [34092]

Mr. Raynsford: We have no plans to review the system for making and determining applications for outline planning permission.

Traffic Congestion (South Devon)

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received regarding traffic congestion in the Kingskerswell area of South Devon; and if he will make a statement. [34034]

Ms Glenda Jackson: During the consultation on the Roads Review, my Department received seven representations, including ones from Devon County Council and Torbay Borough Council in favour of a Kingskerswell Bypass. We have also recently received three representations from organisations representing local business interests, supporting the project.

Following the decision in November 1996 to withdraw the scheme from the trunk road programme, Devon County Council has been looking at how it can take forward a bypass as a local road scheme under the Private Finance Initiative. On 17 November Devon County Council submitted a summary report outlining a private finance project to include the Kingskerswell Bypass.

Green Belt

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 3 March 1998, Official Report, column 559, on planning consents in the green belt, if he will list the Parliamentary constituencies in which the 573 dwellings are located and the number in each. [33747]

Mr. Raynsford: The answer from my hon. Friend the Minister for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning to the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling of 3 March refers to 373 dwellings in the Green Belt which have received planning consent on appeal since 1 May 1997. Information from the Planning Inspectorate received since reveals a total of 382 dwellings. Information on the location of these dwellings is not collected by reference to Parliamentary Constituency in which these consents were granted. The following table sets out the location of these dwellings by local authority area.

Thameslink 2000

Mr. Hopkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he has decided whether a public inquiry is to be held into Railtrack's application for an order under the Transport and Works Act 1992 in respect of the Thameslink 2000 project. [34676]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Secretary of State has decided to defer until 25 September the date by which he must reach a decision on whether to hold a public inquiry into Thameslink 2000 (the "operative date"). This does not mean that there will necessarily be a further delay of 6 months in taking forward this application; the decision could be taken at any time up to 25 September.

MV Derbyshire

Mr. Hepburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will publish the Assessors' report into their survey of the "Derbyshire"; if he will order the reopening of the formal investigation into the loss of the vessel; and if he will make a statement. [34677]

Mr. Prescott: The Assessors' report into the survey of the Derbyshire, commissioned by my predecessor and the European Transport Commissioner is published today. Copies of the full Report and its Summary have been placed in the Library of the House.

As the Assessors' Report, and the survey material on which it is based, represents new and important evidence which could not be produced at the original investigation, I shall order the reopening of the Formal Investigation into the loss of the Derbyshire. Before I do so I am inviting interested parties to submit written representations within twelve weeks on whether the Formal Investigation should be reopened in whole or in part, on what questions it should address, and on whether the rehearing should be held by a wreck Commissioner or by the High Court.

Arrangements are being made to allow interested parties to examine the survey material collected by the Assessors.

MINISTER WITHOUT PORTFOLIO

Millennium Exhibition (Sponsorship)

Mr. Maude: To ask the Minister without Portfolio how many firms have pledged to provide sponsorship for the Millennium Exhibition. [31197]

Mr. Mandelson: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Yvette Cooper) on 24 February 1998, Official Report, column 204.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Surveys

Mr. Forth: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list each information, promotional, marketing and opinion survey contract, with its value, concluded by his Department and its agencies for the years (a) 1997–98, (b) 1998–99, (c) 1999–2000, (d) 2000–2001 and (e) 2001–2002. [32017]

Mr. Kilfoyle: For this answer my Department includes the Prime Minister's Office and the Central Office of Information.

The survey contracts or contracts that have included surveys that my Department has that extend across or expire in the years in the question are as follows:

A survey to establish the level of customer satisfaction in the Property Advisers to the Civil Estate (PACE); value—£21,800; duration 1996–97 to 1997–98.

A framework arrangement to consult members of the public on public services; the value depends on how often the arrangement is used (expenditure to date—£52,845); October 1996 to October 1998.

Advice on options for the provision of accommodation for the use of the Civil Service College including an assessment of private sector interest; value—£25,000; October 1997 to January 1998.

A marketing survey to assist the Government Care and Despatch Agency formulating a new marketing strategy; value—£22,600; January to March 1998.

A framework arrangement to facilitate consultation with members of the public about the delivery of public services; value depends on how often the framework arrangement is used over its life; February 1998 to January 2001.

A survey of civil servants' views and experiences on lifelong learning; value—£54,788; March to July 1998.

Civil Service

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what percentage of the administration trainees who joined the Civil Service in the last available year (a) were arts graduates, (b) were graduates of Oxford or Cambridge and (c) attended public schools. [33042]

Dr. David Clark [holding answer 6 March 1998]: In the 1997 General Fast Stream competition, 170 candidates were recommended by the Final Selection Board for appointment to the Fast Stream Development Programme of the Civil Service. Of these: (a) 66.5% were graduates in arts-related subjects; (b) 43.5% were graduates of Oxford or Cambridge; and (c) of the 82% of candidates where the information is available, 50% attended independent schools.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement about the future of the Next Steps policy of management reform in the civil service and about the 1997 Next Steps report. [34414]

Dr. David Clark: The Government have today published the 1997 Next Steps Report, CM-3889, which has been laid in both Houses. This report brings together performance and trend data on 138 executive agencies and four departments operating on Next Steps lines. It is now 10 years since the Next Steps policy was launched. As the report makes clear, the percentage of civil servants working in Next Steps agencies or in departments organised on Next Steps lines last year passed the target of 75 per cent. set during the early days of the project. This is a considerable milestone in a project which, with cross-party support, has brought improvements in efficiency and customer focus across a wide range of services provided by government.

The Government believe that the benefits from this change to civil service organisation can be developed further. Analysis of agency performance data shows that the need for continuous improvement has not always been given sufficient attention, in part because it has been overshadowed by the emphasis on agency creation. The Government are therefore marking a change in priorities by moving on from the agency creation phase of the Next Steps policy, and launching a new phase with the focus on performance. While agencies will continue to be created, the primary focus will be on further improving the quality, efficiency and convenience to users of agency services.

Ministers will be concerned to ensure that agency targets set out sufficiently clearly the level and direction of achievement required. Agencies will be encouraged to share best practice, including harnessing the full potential of IT and cooperating with other bodies beyond the agency boundaries. These themes will be further developed in the Better Government White Paper to be published later in the Spring. Building on the sound principles of Next Steps, it is our intention to see that the agencies of government are among the world leaders in delivering high quality, efficient and effective public services for the new Millennium.

Freedom of Information

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many (a) individuals, (b) companies, (c) campaign groups, (d) hon. Members of either House, (e) Members of the European Parliament and (f) government departments or agencies had responded to his consultation paper on freedom of information by the end of the consultation period; what proportions of each category responded by e-mail or participated in his on-line discussion forum; and if he will place in the Library (i) a list of respondents and (ii) copies of submissions not requesting confidentiality. [33118]

Dr. David Clark: By 10 March nearly 550 responses had been received to the consultation on the White Paper Your Right to Know, the Government's proposals for a Freedom of Information Act. The exact breakdown requested is not available but responses can be broken down as follows:

	Total number of responses	Responses by e-mail	On-line discussion
(a) individuals	159	102	38
(b) businesses	65	11	2
(c) media	6	1	0
(d) academics	59	14	0
(e) charities, lobby groups and campaign groups	79	20	4
(f) hon. Members of either House	4	0	0
(g) public authorities	145	15	1
(h) Members of the European Parliament	0	0	0
(i) others	26	7	3
Total	543	170	48

This table broadly covers categories (a) to (e) in the question. As far as category (f) is concerned the White Paper "Your Right to Know" contains the Government's collectively agreed proposals for a Freedom of Information Act. The consultation on the White Paper was therefore designed for members of the public and other outside interests, not Government departments or agencies, to submit their views on the proposals.

I will be placing a list of all respondees and copies of all submissions not requesting confidentiality in the Library shortly.

Public Bodies (Reports)

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the bodies within the responsibility of his Department currently required by legislation to lay a report before Parliament. [33550]

Mr. Kilfoyle [holding answer 9 March 1998]: The bodies that fall within the responsibility of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster's Department (the Office of Public Service) and which are required to lay a report before Parliament are:

The Civil Service College

Security Facilities Executive

The Buying Agency.

The Central Office of Information is an executive agency and a separate Department within the responsibility of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. It is also required to lay a report before Parliament.

All are covered by Treasury Accounts Directions and are therefore required by legislation to have their annual reports and accounts laid before Parliament.

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what advice has been given to British embassies and consulates overseas concerning the need to achieve millennium computer compliance; and what funds he will make available for this purpose. [32670]

Mr. Fatchett [holding answer 3 March 1998]: All Strategic IT systems used in Embassies and Consulates (Posts) are supplied and maintained from the UK and compliance is addressed through our Millennium Programme. Mr. Fatchett [holding answer 3 March 1998]: The current estimate of the cost to the FCO of achieving millennium compliance is £2,342,000.

Indonesia

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the Indonesian Government's recent application of Indonesia's Criminal Code, Law 5/1969. [32987]

Mr. Fatchett: We continue to monitor the situation.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Indonesian Government's use of armed forces during recent riots. [32983]

Mr. Fatchett: We have urged the Indonesian authorities to respond to civil unrest with restraint.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to alleviate the current economic crisis in Indonesia. [32982]

Mr. Fatchett: In conjunction with G7 and EU colleagues we are encouraging Indonesia to adhere to the IMF programme for Indonesia. I made this point directly to President Soeharto last week.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to support a system of plural nominations in the forthcoming Indonesian presidential elections. [33008]

Mr. Fatchett: President Soeharto's reappointment took place in accordance with the Indonesian constitution. We support democracy, including free and fair elections, in all countries.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will impose an immediate moratorium on all defence equipment being sold to the Indonesian Government; and if he will make representations to other EU states to act in the same manner. [32986]

Mr. Fatchett: No. We consider all export licence applications case by case against the criteria published in July 1997.

Mr. Fatchett: We watch the Indonesian political scene closely. We encourage all countries to follow the highest standard of governance.

Caribbean (Nuclear Waste)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 24 February 1998, Official Report, column 191, on the basis of what advice he was able to give reassurances over the safety and liability of nuclear waste shipped through the Caribbean; if he will make a statement on the comments he made on this matter at a press conference in Nassau; and if he will place in the Library a copy of the Communiqué of the Caribbean-UK ministerial meeting. [33131]

Mr. Fatchett: The International Maritime Organisation and the International Atomic Energy Agency set extremely high standards for shipments of nuclear waste. My right hon. Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary was able to assure Caribbean Ministers that the ships that BNFL use for such cargoes fully meet or exceed these standards. The casks containing the waste are massive steel structures designed to withstand collision, fire and submersion. The waste itself is in a solid glass-like form which could not cause widespread contamination in any credible accident scenario. These are regular commercial shipments; the companies involved are substantial and are required to carry liability insurance. I have placed copies of the Statements issued at the end of the UK/Caribbean Forum in the Libraries of both Houses.

European Community Legislation

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of draft European Community legislation in 1997 was not subject to discussion at the College of Commissioners prior to submission to the Council of Ministers; what proportion of legislation the Council of Ministers was not required to approve before enactment; and what assessment he has made of the procedures in respect of such legislation. [33884]

Mr. Doug Henderson: All Commission proposals for legislation to be adopted by the Council of Ministers are first approved by the College of Commissioners.

In addition, the Commission has the power to make legislation under powers which are delegated in specific cases under primary legislation approved by the Council of Ministers. Such measures constitute more than 90 per cent. of Community legislative acts, the majority being detailed market management measures. They are normally subject to scrutiny by a committee of Member States' representatives, and may in some cases be referred to the Council of Ministers.

A review of the procedures for the exercise of implementing powers conferred on the Commission is envisaged in Declaration No. 31 attached to the Final Act of the Amsterdam Treaty.

Qualified Majority Voting

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 3 March 1998, Official Report, column 511, on qualified majority voting, if he will define matters other than the approximation of laws; which body will determine if a measure falls into this category; and what measures are planned to be implemented under this provision. [33919]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Under Article 34(2)(c) of the Treaty on European Union as introduced by the Treaty of Amsterdam, the Council may adopt decisions for any purposes consistent with the objectives of Title VI (provisions on police and judicial co-operation in criminal matters) which do not involve approximation of the laws and regulations of the Member States. These might include decisions concerning measures of practical co-operation or expenditure programmes in the police and judicial field, but it is too soon to anticipate what measures might be adopted under this provision.

It will be for the Council to determine whether measures will fall into this category.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those parliamentary questions he has taken eight weeks or more to answer since 1 May 1997. [32709]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: None.

Chile

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if representatives of the British Embassy in Santiago, Chile will attend the swearing in of General Pinochet as a senator for life; and if he will make a statement. [34093]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: No member of the British Embassy in Santiago attended this ceremony.

Visa Applications

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when a decision will be made on the visa application by Adul Rehman, Islamabad reference IMM/E2002. [34161]

Mr. Fatchett: Our High Commission in Islamabad have referred the application to the Home Office and await their decision on the application. My noble friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs will write to my hon. Friend within one week of Islamabad receiving those instructions.

Partners in Europe

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received on the distribution of the Partners in Europe information pack. [33013]

Dr. Howells: I have been asked to reply.

The DfEE has received widespread positive feedback from those receiving the pack: teachers in particular have indicated that they have found it helpful for their curriculum work. The pack has also prompted nearly 600 entries for the "Celebrating Europe" competition. We have received 8 complaints about the pack relating to its cost or relevance.

PRIME MINISTER

Overseas Visits

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister how many overseas visits have been made by his political advisers at public expense since 1 May. [25140]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 23 January 1998]: My Chief of Staff and Chief Press Secretary have usually accompanied me on visits overseas. Apart from them, I have been accompanied by special advisers on five overseas visits.

Royal Prerogative

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister what plans he has to increase democratic involvement and accountability in matters currently dealt with under the Royal Prerogative. [33645]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 10 March 1998]: The Government are committed to the renewal of democracy in the United Kingdom and have already begun a programme of constitutional reform to this end. There are no plans at present to legislate on matters dealt with under the Royal Prerogative.

Bloody Sunday

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Prime Minister to which parts of the Government's archives, relating to the events in Derry on Bloody Sunday, the 75 year rule will apply. [33980]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 11 March 1998]: Following the completion of the public inquiry into the events of 30 January 1972 in Londonderry (the Widgery Tribunal) the inquiry papers and evidence were transferred to the Public Record Office where they are open for public inspection. Only one piece, HO219/56, remains closed for 75 years, until 2048, for reasons of personal sensitivity.

A number of Government Departments may still have papers relating to the events of Bloody Sunday, but these will not yet have been reviewed under normal 30 year rule procedures.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Barristers

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Attorney-General, pursuant to his answer of 3 March 1998, Official Report, column 539, if he will make it his policy to collect information on the numbers of barristers from the ethnic minorities on the panels he uses for common law and chancery work. [33376]

The Attorney-General: I have set up a working party to review how appointments of counsel concerned with the Crown's civil work are made, to consider monitoring of the use of counsel once appointed and to make recommendations to me. The working party, which is being chaired by the Solicitor-General and includes two representatives of the General Council of the Bar of England and Wales, will consider specifically whether a formal data collection mechanism should be established. After the working party has reported to me, I shall consider their recommendations and I shall announce any changes in policy which I propose to implement.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Attorney-General if he will list those parliamentary questions he has taken eight weeks or more to answer since 1 May 1997. [32703]

The Attorney-General: I have not had any parliamentary questions since 1 May 1997 that have taken eight or more weeks to answer.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Market Research

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what expenditure has been incurred by his Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies (a) in 1996–97 and (b) since 1 May 1997 on (i) opinion polling, (ii) focus groups and (iii) other forms of market research; if he will list the surveys commissioned and the purpose of each; and if he will make a statement. [26681]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 5 February 1998]: The Government are committed to consulting and involving the public in order to help inform both policy formulation and the delivery of quality public services, and to ensure that we receive the best value for money from our publicity spend.

Details of expenditure incurred by the Department, through the Central Office of information, on (i) opinion polling, (ii) focus groups and (iii) other forms of market research are shown in the following table.

Information about market research commissioned by the Department's agencies and non-departmental public bodies is not held centrally.

University Applications

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the impact of the announcement of the introduction of tuition fees on applications for university places in 1998. [29977]

Dr. Howells: The latest figures from the University and Colleges Admissions Service (UCAS) show that the fall in applicant numbers by 15 December was—at some 4 per cent.—even lower than the figure it announced before Christmas (6 per cent.); and by 5 February the fall in applicant numbers compared with the same date last year was down to just under 3 per cent. It is still too early to use these figures as a definitive guide to final applicant or entrant numbers. Last year, applicant numbers as at 15 December represented about 75 per cent. of the final number received. However, they are a welcome sign that many prospective students and their parents now understand the fairness of the Government's proposals.

Music Teachers

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what minimum qualifications are required to allow a person to teach pupils to play musical instruments in schools. [33364]

Ms Estelle Morris: Musical instrument tuition is usually given by peripatetic instructors. It is the responsibility of schools and LEAs to decide if instructors are adequately qualified. No minimum qualification requirements are laid down nationally. If, however, such instruction in a state funded school is given by a person who is employed as a teacher, it is a condition of their employment that they should normally hold qualified teacher status.

PGCE Courses

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to remove the upper age limit for entrants to PGCE courses. [33792]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Department's requirements for courses of initial training do not stipulate age limits for entry to PGCE or other initial training courses. Providers, who are responsible for the selection of candidates, are expected to use their discretion to ensure that all trainees who successfully complete a course will be employable.

Class Sizes

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many classes at KS1 in each LEA had more than 30 pupils in (a) January 1996 and (b)January 1997. [33836]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 10 March 1998]: The available information on number of classes at key stage 1 of more than 30 pupils taught by one teacher in maintained primary schools is shown in the table.

County Music Services

Mrs. Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many county councils have music services; how many local education authorities support and finance county music centres; and how many county councils and local education authorities finance youth orchestras and boards. [33746]

Ms Estelle Morris: This information is not collected centrally.

Mrs. Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what measures the Government are taking to enable county councils and local education authorities to ensure a secure financial basis for music services. [33745]

Ms Estelle Morris: It is for local education authorities and governing bodies to decide what proportion of their budget to spend on central music services. The Government are currently considering ways in which it might be possible to increase opportunities for children to have equitable access to high quality musical instrument tuition.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list those parliamentary questions he has taken eight weeks or more to answer since 1 May 1997. [32707]

Dr. Howells: Two thousand, five hundred and seventy six Parliamentary Questions have been tabled to the Department between 1 May 1997 and 12 March 1998. All have been answered within eight weeks of being tabled.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Sports Funding

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much National Lottery money was received by the governing bodies of sport and recreation in (a) 1996–97 and (b) 1997–98. [33306]

Mr. Banks: Most applications are made by local organisations. Awards made by the English Sports Council from the National Lottery Sports Fund to the governing bodies of sport themselves are as follows:

[1] Includes awards made to English and UK/GB governing bodies of sport.
[2] Includes £8.9 million subsistence costs awarded direct to athletes in response to applications from governing bodies of sport.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the total grant-in-aid awarded to the national governing bodies of sport and recreation in (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98 and (c) 1998–99. [33304]

Mr. Banks: The total grant-in-aid awarded by the United Kingdom and the English Sports Councils for the years in question is set out in the table. Many governing bodies also benefit from a number of services and programmes provided by the Sports Councils or organisations funded by them, and from the use of facilities and services provided by the six National Sports Centres. My Department provides grant-in-aid directly to the British Chess Federation.

[4] The figure covers the period 1 April 1996–31 December 1996.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the amount of grant-in-aid to (a) the United Kingdom Sports Council and (b) the English Sports Council for the years (i) 1996–97, (ii) 1997–98 and (iii) 1998–99. [33305]

Mr. Banks: The amount of grant-in-aid to the United Kingdom Sports Council and the English Sports Council for the years in question is set out in the table.

[3] The United Kingdom and the English Sports Councils became fully operational on 1 January 1997, when they took over the responsibilities and functions of the GB Sports Council. The figure, therefore, covers the period 01/01/97—31/03/97. The GB Sports Council received £27.676 million in grant-in-aid during the period 01/04/96—31/12/96.

Concessionary Television Licences

Mr. Wills: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to his oral answer to the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Crausby) of 16 February 1998, Official Report, column 747, what was the basis of the calculation of the figure of £450 million a year with reference to the cost of extending the concessionary television licence scheme. [33502]

Mr. Fisher: The figure of £450 million a year referred to in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Crausby) relates to the estimated cost in lost television licence fee revenue of providing concessionary television licences for all pensioner-only households. These costs are estimated at £463 million in the case of free licences and £437 million for £5 licences.

Mr. Wills: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what would be the cost of introducing a concession of 50 per cent. on television licences for all pensioner households; [33468]

(2) what would be the cost of extending the present entitlement to concessionary television licences to all pensioners over (a) 75 and (b) 80 years of age. [33469]

Mr. Fisher: To provide a 50% reduction in the licence fee for all pensioner-only households would cost approximately £232 million annually in lost television licence fee revenue. To extend the existing £5 concessionary television licence scheme to households where all members are aged 75 or over would cost an estimated £153 million a year; to extend the scheme to households where all members are aged 80 or over would cost approximately £79 million a year.

Out-of-school Clubs

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how the proposed out-of-school clubs are to be funded; and if he will specify the percentage of funding coming from each source. [34170]

Mr. Banks: Subject to the passing of the National Lottery Bill, the New Opportunities Fund will allocate £400 million from the new Lottery good causes to the out-of-school hours activities initiative. Of this, £180 million will be directed towards out-of-school hours learning activities and £220 million will support out-of-school child care, including £20 million for integrated childcare and education schemes. The New Opportunities Fund, like other Lottery distributors, will seek a partnership contribution from applicants for projects, but this will be flexible and will take account of applicants' ability to obtain such support.

The Government are, separately, making available an additional £80 million for child care from Exchequer sources: £30 million from receipts from the windfall tax and £50 million from the Out-of-School Child care initiative[1].

SCOTLAND

Contaminated Land

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of hectares of contaminated land in each of the last 12 years in each county and region. [33036]

Mr. Macdonald: Information on contaminated land in each of the last 12 years is not available centrally. However, the Scottish Vacant and Derelict Land Survey 1996 provides some information on contamination. Of the 8,482 hectares (2,546 sites) of derelict land recorded in the survey, 1,672 ha (279 sites) are suspected to be contaminated and 1,490 ha (181 sites) are known to be contaminated. The known contamination of derelict land by local authority area is as follows:

Copies of the full report on the Scottish Vacant and Derelict Land Survey are available in the House of Commons Library.

History Teaching

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to ensure that all pupils leaving Scottish schools have studied some Scottish, British and other history. [33386]

Mr. Wilson: A number of opportunities already exist for pupils to study a wide range of history in Scottish schools. The National Guidelines on Environmental Studies 5–14 for pupils between those ages recommend that historical studies are drawn from 5 periods and include Scottish, British and other (European and World) contexts. Standard Grade courses for pupils aged 14–16 provide opportunities to study history in Scottish, British and other wider contexts. Further opportunities for the study of Scottish, British and other areas of history are provided in the current Revised Higher and Certificate of Sixth Year Studies courses. Provision for the post-16 age group will be enhanced following the introduction of Higher Still in 1999. Courses and units will be available at 5 levels. Students undertaking the new History courses at Intermediate 1, Intermediate 2 or Higher levels will study at least one Scottish/British topic and at least one European/World topic.

Notes:

1. Reports have been taken as including Accounts, where these are produced separately.

Regional Selective Assistance

Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list, for each offer of regional selective assistance made during 1997, the percentage of the project's capital cost represented by the grant offered; and if he will indicate, for each offer, if it related to an area of full or intermediate assisted area status. [33704]

Mr. Wilson: Each year there are more than 200 offers of Regional Selective Assistance in Scotland. Information about the capital costs of individual projects is commercially confidential. The percentages of grant to capital costs for the total of RSA offers in 1997 in the Scottish Development Areas range from a minimum of 2.8 per cent. to a maximum of 29 per cent., and 2.8 per cent. to 14.9 per cent. respectively in Intermediate Areas. These figures are calculated on the basis of Net Grant Equivalent, which is expressed as the discounted value of grant, net of tax, as a proportion of the discounted fixed capital costs. These vary widely according to the type of project and reflect the selective nature of the RSA scheme whereby projects are secured for the minimum necessary costs.

Creagan Bridge

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when work on the construction of the Creagan Bridge will begin; and what is the forecast date for its completion. [33682]

Mr. McLeish: The contract will be awarded later this month with construction work expected to commence in late April. The anticipated completion date for the contract is Spring 1999.

Cairngorm Funicular Railway

Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what conditions he has placed on the Highland and Island Enterprise's expenditure on the proposed funicular railway on Cairngorm. [33608]

Mr. Wilson: The approval of my right hon. Friend to the financial contribution of Highlands and Islands Enterprise to the Cairngorm funicular railway project was made subject to the following conditions:

1. that the project succeeded in securing the remaining capital funding needed to carry it out;

2. that there should be no further financial contribution to the project from Highlands and Islands Enterprise or from any other source funded by the Secretary of State; and

3. that Moray, Badenoch and Strathspey Enterprise, the local enterprise company for the area, should exercise its right to appoint a director to the Board of the Cairngorm Chairlift Company.

Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if his economic evaluation prior to his decision to agree to Highland and Islands Enterprise's expenditure on the proposed funicular railway on Cairngorm included estimates of the likely impact on the (a) summer and (b) winter business of other Scottish ski centres; [33676]

(2) what estimate he has made of the number of summer visitors to the proposed funicular railway on Cairngorm; and if he will make a statement on the basis for this prediction; [33609]

(3) if he will publish the economic evaluation he conducted prior to his decision to agree to Highlands and Island Enterprise's expenditure on the proposed funicular railway on Cairngorm. [33602]

Mr. Wilson: My right hon. Friend has not undertaken any separate economic evaluation of the proposed Cairngorm funicular railway. The economics appraisal of the project was an operational matter for the Highlands and Islands Enterprise network. I have asked the Chairman of that organisation to write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what is the estimated increase in turnover of the Cairngorm ski area following the introduction of the proposed funicular railway; how many new full-time equivalent jobs are predicted to be created; and what the average rate of pay is likely to be for those jobs; [33607]

(2) what aspects of the original scheme for a funicular railway on Cairngorm have been dropped under recent proposals to reduce the projected cost; and what estimate has been made of the impact of these changes on the projected number of summer visitors. [33671]

Mr. Wilson: These aspects of the appraisal of the Cairngorm funicular railway project are an operational matter for the Highlands and Islands Enterprise network which conducted that appraisal. I will ask the Chairman of that organisation to write to the hon. Member.

Tourism

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the percentage of (a) domestic holiday makers and (b) overseas visitors to the United Kingdom who spend their holiday in Scotland. [33817]

Mr. Wilson: In 1996, the latest year for which figures are available, 9.9% of domestic holiday trips were made to Scotland, while 10.4% of overseas holiday trips to the UK included Scotland.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what tourism initiatives he is undertaking in respect of (a) accommodation schemes and quality standards, (b) promoting Scotland, (c) trade communication, (d) market and product intelligence and research, (e) training and (f) market access and information. [33813]

Mr. Wilson: A new quality assurance scheme for accommodation providers and for visitor attractions has been introduced by the Scottish Tourist Board.

Promotional activity for tourism in Scotland will benefit from the Government's decision to allocate £19.3 million to the Scottish Tourist Board in 1998–99, an increase of £1 million over the planned provision by the previous Administration.

The Scottish Tourist Board, with assistance from the Department of Trade and Industry sector challenge fund, is implementing an information technology strategy for the industry. This will enable tourists to access information and make bookings more easily. Trade communication has benefited from the work of the Scottish Tourism Forum, an industry representative body established by The Scottish Office.

I announced in October 1997 the establishment of a group to consider and advise on how the tourism industry in Scotland can maximise its performance as we enter the new Millennium. The group will be chaired by Lord Gordon of Strathblane, the new Chairman of the Scottish Tourist Board, and will report to the Scottish Tourism Co-ordinating Group, which I chair.

I am announcing later this month further action designed to promote tourism training and tourism as a career.

Further details about these and other initiatives are set out in the "Scottish Tourism Strategic Plan Progress Report 1998", which I will publish next week. I shall ensure that the hon. Member receives a copy, and that copies are placed in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those parliamentary questions he has taken eight weeks or more to answer since 1 May 1997. [32715]

Mr. Dewar: Regrettably this information is currently not held centrally. However, arrangements have been made to ensure that it will be recorded from 1 March onwards.

Police Housing

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the police forces in Scotland which have not followed the guidance of the Police Advisory Board for Scotland to provide serving officers with the opportunity to purchase a police house they inhabit at terms comparable with those available under the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987. [33991]

Mr. McLeish: Police houses are the property of the police authorities who have discretion to decide whether or not to dispose of particular houses and whether a discount should be offered in such cases on terms comparable with those available under the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987. Information about the terms of sale of police houses is not held centrally.

Schools

Mr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the proportion of schools in (a) the Strathclyde area and (b) Scotland as a whole, which do not have school boards; and if he will make a statement. [33691]

Mr. Wilson: The information held centrally is given in the table. It is taken from statistical returns by education authorities to The Scottish Office on the results of the biennial elections in 1995–96.

Police Statistics

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the (a) population served, (b) geographical area covered and (c) strength of each police force in Scotland and the ratio of (c) in each force area to (a) and (b); and what is the ratio of police officers (i) per head of population and (ii) to geographical area in Scotland as a whole. NORTHERN IRELAND

Tourism

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what tourism initiatives she is undertaking in respect of (a) accommodation schemes and quality standards, (b) promoting Northern Ireland, (c) trade communication, (d) market and product intelligence and research, (e) training and (f) market access and information. [33814]

Mr. Ingram: The Northern Ireland Tourist Board (NITB) has recently published 'A Strategy for the Development of Tourism in Northern Ireland' which contains proposals and recommendations for the future of Northern Ireland's tourism industry.

(a) NITB operates a number of programmes of selective financial assistance for developing tourist accommodation, subject to published priorities. All accommodation for sale to tourists in Northern Ireland must be certified by the Northern Ireland Tourist Board.

(b) During 1998–99, NITB will invest in excess of £3.3 million in the promotion of tourism. This will be supplemented by private sector marketing investment and benefits derived from joint promotional campaigns with the Irish Tourist Board.

(c) In recognition of the importance of effective trade communication, NITB has established a Marketing Advisory Group involving partners deriving tourism benefits from both the public and private sector.

(d) NITB's Research Department continually monitors key economic indicators in connection with the performance of the Northern Ireland tourism industry. It also conducts specific evaluations appropriate to the needs of industry.

(e) NITB co-ordinates a training initiative "Welcome Host" which recognises the importance of excellence in customer service not only in the core tourism industry, but in all sectors that benefit from tourism.

(f) NITB continues to work with air and sea carriers to encourage them to improve direct gateway access to Northern Ireland.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on the percentage of (a) domestic holiday makers and (b) overseas visitors to the United Kingdom who spend their holiday in Northern Ireland. [33818]

Mr. Ingram: In 1996, it is estimated that 1.5 per cent. of all domestic holiday trips taken by UK residents were taken in Northern Ireland, and that 1.9 per cent. of all overseas holiday visitors to the UK visited Northern Ireland.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list those parliamentary questions she has taken eight weeks or more to answer since 1 May 1997. [32712]

Marjorie Mowlam: Between 1 May 1997 and 1 March 1998 this Department failed to answer one question, UIN number 10273, from the hon. and learned Member for North Down (Mr. McCartney), concerning the purchasing of electoral voting and non voting lists covering the 1996 Forum elections, within 8 weeks of the date it was due for answer.

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list the (a) population and (b) geographical area served by the RUC; and what is the ratio of police officers (i) per head of population and (ii) to geographical area in Northern Ireland. [33989]

Mr. Ingram: The population of Northern Ireland, based on the last census, is 1,547,300; the geographical area is 3,495,255 acres. The ratio of police officers, including full and part-time Reserve Officers, per head of population is 1:115 and the ratio to geographical area is 1:260 acres.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list those parliamentary questions she has taken eight weeks or more to answer since 1 May 1997. [32713]

Clare Short: No parliamentary questions to my Department since 1 May 1997 have taken eight weeks or more to answer.

Bhutanese Refugees

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what financial assistance the United Kingdom is providing to the Bhutanese Refugee Assistance programme. [33748]

Clare Short: The Department for International Development (DFID) is currently providing assistance to the Bhutanese refugees in Nepal through support for a Save the Children project. The project covers disease control, disability/community based rehabilitation, vocational training for income generation, refugee managed community health training, and a children's play programme.

The amounts of the grants provided to this Save the Children project over the last 3 years are shown in the table.

	Amount
1995–96	100,000
1996–97	75,800
1997–98	85,849

Iraq

Ms Stuart: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what measures she is taking to alleviate the suffering of people living in Baghdad-controlled Iraq. [34609]

Clare Short: Britain co-sponsored the UN Security Council Resolution passed on 20 February, which increased the oil-for-food provision to $5.256 billion over 180 days, and is sponsoring a meeting to work with the UN to improve implementation of Security Council Resolution 1153.

I am pleased to announce that we are also starting a new bilateral programme worth about £7 million to relieve the suffering inflicted on the ordinary people in Iraq, particularly the children, by Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will provide support to the Baghdad office of the World Health Organisation in its planned research into the health effects on people in southern Iraq of the dispersal of depleted uranium dust. [33975]

Clare Short: We have no information that the World Health Organisation is seeking assistance for such a study.

Centre for International Briefing

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to visit the Centre for International Briefing at Farnham; and if she will make a statement. [33920]

Clare Short: I have no plans to visit the Centre for International Briefing at Farnham. However, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State plans to visit the Centre on 15 July 1998.

Chechnya

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assistance her Department is currently providing in Chechnya. [33894]

Clare Short: The Department for International Development is not providing bilateral assistance to Chechnya at present. But the Department is contributing to multilateral agencies such as the United Nations High Commission for Refugees and the International Committee of the Red Cross, who have programmes in the region.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Ministerial Transport

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his estimate of the cost of (a) Ministerial cars and drivers and (b) the Department's bill for taxis in (i) 1995–96, (ii) 1996–97, (iii) 1997–98 to date and (iv) 1997–98 full year. [27771]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 5 February 1998]: The cost of Ministerial cars is as follows:

1995–96	233,261.56
1996–97	230,849.91
1997–98 to date	223,822.87
1997–98 full year	228,350 (forecast)

The information relating to the expenditure on taxis could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Casualty Stock

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the impact of (a) ending subsidies and (b) banning hunting on the (i) problems and (ii) expense to livestock farmers who need to dispose of casualty stock. [33004]

Mr. Rooker: The objective of the support to the rendering industry was to avoid the disorderly collapse of the meat chain in the immediate aftermath of the BSE crisis. This was achieved. A wide range of industry bodies and representatives were involved in drawing up the Schemes, which were always intended to cover only the financial years 1996/97 and 1997/98, and to provide reduced support in the second year to allow the meat chain to adjust to the post BSE economic and regulatory realities.

The Government are neutral on the issue of hunting. They have made no specific assessment of how a hunting ban would affect livestock farmers who dispose of casualty stock. The Government are, however, fully aware of the current difficulties faced by farmers in the disposal of fallen stock and the important role played by hunt kennels in the disposal chain. Officials are liaising with farming representatives to consider how farmers should, in future, dispose of fallen stock and to encourage the industry to put suitable arrangements in place.

Public Appointments

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many of the appointments to public bodies which he has made since 1 May 1997 have been from the Public Appointments Unit list. [33250]

Mr. Morley: Of the 147 appointments made since 1 May 1997, 13 have been from the Public Appointments Unit List.

Nominations of candidates for MAFF public appointments come from a wide range of sources, including the Public Appointments Unit and advertising, to ensure that there is the widest possible dissemination of information about vacancies.

Dietary Supplements

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his proposed regulations on the retail sale of vitamin B6 have been passed for approval to the European Commission; if he will identify the EC Directive under which such approval must be obtained; if he will indicate the procedures and timetables through which a company in another member state may raise a formal objection to the proposals under the provisions of that Directive; and if he will make a statement. [33515]

Mr. Rooker: The draft regulations which will implement the Government's proposed restriction on the levels of vitamin B6 in food supplements will shortly be notified to the European Commission under Directive 83/189 (the technical Standards Directive) and Directive 79/112 (the Food Labelling Directive). The Technical Standards Directive requires that there shall be a three-month standstill period from the date of notification. During this period, the Commission and other member states have the opportunity to comment on the proposed regulations. It is a matter for individual member states whether, and on what basis, they choose to consult outside interests about measures notified under these procedures.

Public Bodies (Reports)

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the bodies within the responsibility of his Department currently required by legislation to lay a report before Parliament. [33555]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 9 March 1998]: The following bodies, for which my right hon. Friend has responsibility, are currently required by legislation to lay a report before Parliament:

Department and Executive Agency

Intervention Board

Executive Agencies

Central Science Laboratory

Centre for Environment, Fisheries and Aquaculture Science

Farming and Rural Conservation Agency

Meat Hygiene Service

Pesticides Safety Directorate

Veterinary Laboratory Agency

Veterinary Medicines Directorate

Executive Non-Departmental Public Bodies

Apple and Pear Research Council

Home-Grown Cereals Authority

Horticultural Development Council

Meat and Livestock Commission

Milk Development Council

Potato Industry Development Council

Royal Botanic Gardens, Kew

Public Corporation

Covent Garden Market Authority.

Previously, the Department has advised that the Veterinary Products Committee had a statutory requirement to publish an annual report and to lay the report before Parliament. It has now been established that this is not the case.

Publications

Mr. Flight: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those European Commission (a) newsletters, (b) magazines and (c) occasional publications to which his Department subscribes. [33653]

Mr. Morley: The Department subscribes to a range of publications to support its work. A central list of those supplied by the European Commission could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Public Engagements

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the public engagements arranged by his Department which were carried out by the Parliamentary Secretary in the House of Lords since 1 June on Fridays and Saturdays. [33673]

Mr. Morley: My noble Friend the Parliamentary Secretary has undertaken the following public engagements since 1 June on Fridays and Saturdays.

Date	Visit
6 June	Farm visit
11 July	Regional visit
18 July	Regional visit
12 September	Overseas visit—Eastern Europe

19 December	Regional visit
16 January	Speaking engagement—London

Pet Passports

Ms Moran: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the RSPCA report, "Passport for Pets and Vets in Support of Change". [33958]

Mr. Rooker: I have read the recommendations in the Quarantine Reform Campaign's report 'The case for change' with interest. I agree with the final recommendation in the report that "decisions in this area must be based on science and not emotion".

This is why we have asked the Advisory Group on Quarantine, under the chairmanship of Professor Kennedy, to carry out an independent scientific assessment of quarantine and alternatives to quarantine.

Forestry Commission Land Sales

Mrs. Organ: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of Forestry Commission land which has been sold in England (a) since 1981 and (b) since 1 May 1997 has a public access agreement in place. [33742]

Mr. Morley: The subject of the question relates to matters undertaken by Forest Enterprise. I have asked its Chief Executive, Dr. Bob McIntosh, to reply to my hon. Friend direct.

Letter from Bob McIntosh to Mrs. Diana Organ, dated 12 March 1998:

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has asked me to reply to your Question about the percentage of Forestry Commission land sold in England with access agreements.

The Commission's disposal policy originates from 1981 but the arrangements for the protection of public access were only introduced in 1991. I have, therefore, limited my answer to the period since 1991, up to 31 December 1997, the latest date for which figures are available on public access agreements.

For the period 1 April 1991 to 31 December 1997 the Forestry Commission sold 10,155 hectares of forest land in England of which 5% (533 hectares) were sold with an agreement to protect public access. For the period 1 May 1997 to 31 December 1997 the respective figures are 860 hectares sold, with 8% (65 hectares) subject to an agreement.

In addition during the whole period 248 hectares of the forest land sold had access protected through a sale to a Local Authority or other benevolent purchaser such as the Woodland Trust.

Finally, the Commission does notify Local Authorities of all forest land sales but in many cases is prevented from formally offering or entering into an agreement because of title constraints and third party rights.

Central Science Laboratory

Mr. Charles Clarke: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 3 March 1998, Official Report, column 596, if he will list the figures for the number of non-scientific staff employed at Sand Hutton, York, for 1996–97 and projected for 1997–98; [34411]

(2) what were the annual overhead costs of the Central Science Laboratory site at Sand Hutton, York, for 1996–97 and projected for 1997–98. [34412]

Mr. Rooker: In respect of the information requested for 1997–98, I refer my hon. Friend to the replies given to him on 11 March 1998, Official Report, column 256. Information for the period 1996–97 is not available solely in relation to the Sand Hutton, York site, to which the Central Science Laboratory moved over a period of months from sites at Slough, Worplesdon, Harpenden and a number of other sites, beginning in the autumn of 1996.

BSE

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cases of BSE have been confirmed in live dairy stock imported from EU countries. [33878]

Mr. Rooker: We have confirmed BSE in five dairy animals imported from other Member States. These animals are classified by the type of herd in which they resided at the time the disease was reported. It is possible that all five animals were infected with BSE in the UK.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those parliamentary questions he has taken eight weeks or more to answer since 1 May 1997. [32705]

Mr. Morley: Since 1 May 1997, two parliamentary questions took more than eight weeks to answer. One question from the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) was answered on 27 January 1998, Official Report, column 205, and a question from the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) was answered on 11 February 1998, Official Report, column 276.

Dutch Ware Potatoes

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment has been made of the benefits of further restricting imports of Dutch ware potatoes through (a) clinical testing and (b) a ban; what assessment he has made of the (i) risks associated with the spread of and (ii) difficulties in eradicating brown rot; and if he will make a statement. [33988]

Mr. Rooker: Measures against potato brown rot are kept under review, in the light of findings in the UK and other Member States and the results of research. Since the Netherlands announced a number of outbreaks in 1995, the Department has increased the number of inspections and laboratory tests on Dutch ware potatoes, but has not confirmed any findings of brown rot. In these circumstances, a ban would not be justified. There is evidence that, although in certain conditions brown rot could cause significant damage to UK crops, localised outbreaks can be eradicated. The Department is discussing with interested parties plans for eradicating the bacterium from infected watercourses, where it could present a risk of further spread.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Magistrates (South Yorkshire)

Mr. Ennis: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many magistrates sit on the Barnsley magistrates' bench; and how many of those magistrates reside in the Barnsley, East and Mexborough constituency. [33208]

Mr. Hoon: There are currently 123 active magistrates on the Barnsley Bench of whom 14 reside within the constituency of Barnsley, East and Mexborough.

Mr. Ennis: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many magistrates sit on the Doncaster Magistrates' bench; and how many of those magistrates reside in the Barnsley, East and Mexborough constituency. [33261]

Mr. Hoon: There are currently 190 magistrates on the Doncaster Bench, of whom 18 magistrates reside in the Barnsley, East and Mexborough constituency.

Public Appointments

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many of the appointments to public bodies which he has made since 1 May 1997 have been from the Public Appointments Unit list. [33254]

Mr. Hoon: None of the appointments made by the Lord Chancellor to his public bodies has been from the Public Appointments Unit list, although we have consulted them. The Department has increasingly been using advertising to identify candidates for the Lord Chancellor's more significant advisory bodies. However, in terms of numbers most of the appointments are to the locally based Advisory Committees on Justices of the Peace or General Commissioners of Income Tax, where the appointment is made on local recommendation.

Amsterdam Treaty

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list those paragraphs of Articles 1,2 and 3 of the Treaty of Amsterdam which relate to aspects of judicial proceedings in the United Kingdom and in each case the person, persons, or bodies who will be responsible for their implementation in the United Kingdom; and what consultation Her Majesty's Government had with them prior to 14 June 1997. [33210]

Mr. Hoon: The relevant provisions are to be found in:

(a) Paragraph 11 of Article 1 of the Treaty of Amsterdam, in particular new Article K.3 of the Treaty on European Union, which relates to judicial co-operation in criminal matters; and

(b) Paragraph 15 of Article 2, in particular new Article 73(m) of the EC Treaty, which relates to civil judicial co-operation and which is subject to the Protocol excluding the United Kingdom from the operation of measures in that field unless the United Kingdom indicates that it wishes to take part in any such measure.

The Government themselves are responsible for the implementation of these provisions in the United Kingdom.

Legal Aid

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department for what reasons he has assessed the granting of legal aid to be inappropriate in claims for compensation. [33144]

Mr. Hoon: The Government's reasons for beginning to remove money and damages claims from legal aid to be financed through conditional fees are set out fully in the Consultation Paper Access to Justice with Conditional Fees, a copy of which I have sent to the hon. Gentleman.

TREASURY

South-east Asia

8. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what further discussions he has held with the International Monetary Fund concerning the problems faced by south-east Asian economies. [32500]

Mr. Gordon Brown: I had useful recent discussions with IMF Managing Director Michel Camdessus on the current financial problems in Asia, at both the ECOFIN meeting of EU Finance Ministers on 16 February and at the meeting of G7 Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors on 21 February. In addition, I have been keeping in close and regular touch with the UK's Executive Director to the IMF in Washington. I am encouraged that confidence is beginning to return in those countries where reforms are being implemented with vigour. But the situation in Indonesia remains of serious concern, and renewed commitment to the IMF programme will be vital if financial stability is to be restored.

Individual Savings Account

16. Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what submissions he has received opposing his ISA proposals. [32508]

Mr. Darling: We have received a large number of submissions in response to the proposals in the ISA consultative document. Our objective of encouraging more people to save has been widely welcomed. A variety of comments have been made on our specific proposals and we are considering them all carefully.

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received on his proposals for the individual savings account; and when he expects to make progress on extending the opportunity for tax-exempt savings to the smaller saver. [32523]

Mr. Darling: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has received many helpful and constructive comments for which he is grateful. A fuller announcement will be made.

Windfall Levy

17. Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the current level of receipts from the windfall levy for spending on the welfare-to-work programme. [32509]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: The first tranche of the windfall tax was paid on time and in line with our forecast of some £2.6 billion, on 1 December. We are grateful to the companies for their co-operation.

35. Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had with his European Union counterparts on his policy to spend the windfall levy on a welfare-to-work programme. [32527]

Mr. Gordon Brown: I have discussed the Government's Welfare to Work programme on many occasions with other European Union Finance Ministers, including at ECOFIN. My Ministerial counterparts have been very interested to learn about how the Government is turning its plans into action. I will continue to use the UK's Presidency of the EU to advocate policies such as the Welfare to Work programme which ensure that all young people across the Community are equipped with the skills they need to find and keep work.

Income Tax

19. Mr. McCabe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consultations he has had about the number of tax bands in the income tax structure. [32511]

Mr. Darling: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor receives a wide range of representations every year, on all aspects of the income tax system.

Public Expenditure

20. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will assess the advantages of increasing public expenditure in the forthcoming financial year. [32512]

Mr. Darling: We have always made it clear that we intend to stick to the spending totals we inherited for the first two years of the Parliament, 1997–98 and 1998–99, while we undertake a Comprehensive Spending Review to set the plans for the medium term. But we have also made a significant difference in the short term through measures to reallocate spending within and between departments to reflect our key priorities including education, employment and the health service.

Balance of Payments

21. Mr. Spring: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the impact of recent trends in manufactured exports on the balance of payments. [32513]

Mrs. Liddell: During 1997 as whole, UK exporters performed well in difficult circumstances and export volumes of goods grew by around 8 per cent. Export growth is likely to slow in 1998, and the current account balance is forecast to move into deficit. But the deficit is expected to remain small by historical standards.

Indebted Countries

22. Helen Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has had from Church leaders concerning the problem of international debt. [32514]

25. Mr. Edwards: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from Church leaders about Government policy to reduce third world debt. [32517]

Mr. Gordon Brown: Since my Mauritius Mandate statement to Commonwealth Finance Ministers last September, I have held a number of meetings with religious leaders, including the Archbishop of Canterbury, Cardinal Hume, the Moderator of the Church of Scotland and many others. The UK firmly supports debt relief for the poorest, most indebted countries and is seeking an early solution to many of the problems experienced by them, not least at the moment in finding a solution to the debt problems of Mozambique. The Government take seriously their responsibilities to debt reduction internationally.

26. Mr. John Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had with his European Union counterparts on the Mauritius mandate. [32518]

Mr. Gordon Brown: In September, I wrote to all EU Finance Ministers with the text of my Mauritius Mandate speech, and again in January following the seminar on debt issues that I held at No. 11 Downing Street in December with religious leaders and Non Governmental Organisations' directors. I discussed debt issues with three of my EU colleagues at the G7 Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors meeting last month.

27. Mr. McNulty: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his policy on reducing the debt burden of the poorest countries. [32519]

37. Kali Mountford: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his policy on reducing the debt burden of the poorest countries. [32529]

Mr. Gordon Brown: The Government are fully committed to the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) initiative that was launched by the IMF and World Bank in September 1996. In my speech to Commonwealth Finance Ministers in Mauritius last year, I called on the international community to commit itself to dealing with the problem of unsustainable debt burdens faced by the world's poorest countries once and for all. I urged creditors and debtors to undertake concrete action in order to ensure that at least three-quarters of the twenty countries, initially identified by the World Bank and IMF as probably needing debt relief under the HIPC initiative, have had decisions on the size and timing of their relief by the year 2000. I also encouraged all countries identified under the initiative to embark on the process of securing debt relief by the millennium. The Government propose to continue their efforts to ensure that these targets are met.

In the IMF and World Bank Executive Boards, we have actively supported debt relief under the HIPC initiative for the four countries that have so far had decisions—Uganda, Bolivia, Burkina Faso and Guyana. The Government have also taken a lead in pressing for action to help another indebted country, Mozambique. We have offered to provide up to $10 million to help Mozambique achieve debt sustainability on top of the debt relief and assistance that the UK has already committed.

28. Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received on his policy to reduce the debt burden of the poorest countries. [32520]

Mr. Gordon Brown: I have received support for the targets that I set out for dealing with the unsustainable debt burdens of the world's poorest countries in the Mauritius Mandate from a number of sources, including the President of the World Bank, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Cardinal Basil Hume and other religious leaders.

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total debt owed to (i) the Government and (ii) Export Credits Guarantee Department, by developing countries, excluding Eastern European countries and the countries of the former Soviet Union. [33202]

Mrs. Liddell: (i) The total debt owed to the government at the end of 1997, by all low income countries (excluding Eastern European countries and the countries of the former Soviet Union), as listed in the World Bank Book Global Development Finance, is £4.71 billion.

(ii) ECGD is owed £4.69 billion of this money. The rest is owed to DFID.

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each developing country the total stock of its outstanding debt owed to the United Kingdom on 31 December 1997. [33205]

Mrs. Liddell: The debt stock owed to ECGD at the end of 1997, by each of the low income countries (excluding Eastern European countries and the countries of the former Soviet Union), as listed in the World Bank Book Global Development Finance, is as follows:

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

23. Mr. Borrow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on his policy to ensure economic stability through greater control of the public sector borrowing requirement. [32515]

Mr. Darling: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations in advance of his Budget later this month.

Small and Medium Businesses

24. Mr. Caplin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his policy to ensure economic stability for the small and medium business sector. [32516]

Mrs. Liddell: The Government are seeking to promote the economic stability that will give all sectors of the economy, including small and medium sized business, the confidence to plan and invest for the future.

Bank of England

29. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the reduction in staffing at the Bank of England following the establishment of the proposed European central bank. [32521]

Mrs. Liddell: In view of the fact that the United Kingdom has opted not to join EMU at the outset, the Bank expects the establishment of the European Central Bank will have no implications for the staffing of the Bank of England.

Tax and National Insurance

30. Mr. Rendel: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what research he has evaluated into the advantage of equalising lower earnings levels at which tax and national insurance are first paid. [32522]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government keep the tax and NIC systems under constant review.

European Union Contribution

32. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the net cost to HM Treasury of the United Kingdom's contribution to the EU under the next quinquennial financial perspective. [32524]

Mrs. Liddell: In July 1997 the European Commission issued outline proposals for the next Financial Perspective, which they proposed should run from 2000 to 2006. These formed part of the Commission's Agenda 2000 communication, which also dealt with the enlargement of the Union to Cyprus and the states of central and eastern Europe, and the reform of its main policies.

Enlargement of the EU will deliver substantial economic benefits, as well as reinforcing freedom and democracy throughout the continent. This is the context for the Commission's financial proposals, which would imply a significant increase in net contributions, or reduction in net receipts, for all existing member states.

It would be premature to issue estimates of the amounts involved in advance of the Commission's more detailed proposals, which are expected shortly. In any case any assessment could reflect only the views of the Commission rather than the actual outcome, which will depend on negotiation between member states of the final Agenda 2000 package. The UK will, of course, argue in those negotiations for an approach to the EU's finances which matches the discipline which member states are applying to their domestic budgets.

European Single Currency

33. Dr. Starkey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the steps currently being taken by his Department to prepare for the single European currency. [32525]

Mr. Gordon Brown: I have set up a Euro Preparations Unit (EPU) in the Treasury to play a coordinating role in helping both British business and the public sector prepare for the single currency. The Unit will look at the implications of the introduction of the euro on 1 January 1999 as well as how we would join and introduce the single currency in the United Kingdom if we decided to do so.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will press for Greek membership of the Euro. [33806]

Mrs. Liddell: Decisions on which countries meet the necessary conditions to go forward to Stage III of Economic and Monetary Union will be taken by Heads of Government in May.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if the British Government will support the triangulation method for currency conversion between member states; [34087]

(2) what assessment he has made of the measures which British companies will be required to take in order to prepare their accounts in euros under the triangulation method. [34089]

Mrs. Liddell: After the launch of the euro on 1 January 1999, the national currencies of participating countries will continue to exist as national currency denominations (or units) of the euro during a transitional period of three years. Conversion from one of these national denominations to another national denomination will need to be effected via a conversion to the euro unit, or by another process producing the same result, to ensure that mathematical discrepancies do not arise. This process is described as triangulation and is set out in Council Regulation (EC) No 1103/97 on certain provisions relating to the introduction of the euro, adopted on 17 June 1997. Given that it applies to conversion between national currency units of participating countries and not the euro unit itself, its use will not arise for the calculation and presentation of accounts in euro.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what role the Bank of England will have in assisting the European system of central banks to support the value of the currencies participating in monetary union after 2 May. [34090]

Mrs. Liddell: There can be no presumption that such support will be necessary, but in any event the Bank of England will have no formal obligations to assist the ESCB to support the value of currencies participating in monetary union after 2 May. The Bank will continue to stand ready to assist other central banks in their operations from time to time.

Tobacco and Alcohol

34. Mrs. Lait: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress he is making at ECOFIN in persuading European Union Finance Ministers to increase excise duty on tobacco and alcohol. [32526]

Dawn Primarolo: The issue of excise duty rates on tobacco and alcohol has not been raised in ECOFIN so far during the UK Presidency. We await the commission's report on their reviews of the minimum rates of duty on tobacco and alcohol.

40. Mr. Forth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from associations representing tobacco retailers and/or manufacturers concerning illegal resale of tobacco imported from Belgium. [32532]

Dawn Primarolo: The tobacco trade associations have made a number of written representations concerning the illegal re-sale of tobacco imported from Belgium. In addition I met with the Tobacco Manufacturers' Association on 4 March 1998.

Business Cycles

36. Mr. Flight: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the extent to which the British and continental European business cycles are becoming more synchronised; and if he will make a statement. [32528]

Mrs. Liddell: The Chancellor set out the Government's views on the convergence of the British and continental European business cycles in his statement on EMU on 27 October 1997. In addition the Government published the Treasury's assessment "UK Membership of the Single Currency: an Assessment of the Five Economic Tests" which also discussed this subject.

Local Authority Expenditure

38. Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of total local authority expenditure is met by (a) central Government funds, (b) business rate payers and (c) council tax payers. [32530]

Mr. Darling: In 1995–96, across Great Britain as a whole, central government funds to local authorities had a value of 61 per cent. of total local authority expenditure, business rates payments 18 per cent., and council tax 15 per cent.

Interest Rates

39. Ms Keeble: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to promote long-term stability in interest rates. [32531]

Mr. Gordon Brown: The Government have put in place a credible monetary and fiscal policy framework that will deliver consistently low and stable inflation over the long term. These measures should help promote interest rate stability in the long run, improving the environment for long-term investment.

Company Taxes (Euro)

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer who will bear the exchange costs relating to company taxes paid in euros. [33119]

Mrs. Liddell: A working group, which will report in April, is looking at steps that the Government might take to help businesses that choose to use the euro from 1 January 1999 and the associated implications for departments.

Included in this work is an analysis of the implications of meeting the Government's commitment to allow certain taxes to be paid in euro.

Taxation (Professional Businesses)

Sir Nicholas Lyell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received as to the legality of the Government's proposals to withdraw the cash basis practice for the taxation of professional businesses, with particular reference to the provisions of the Equal Treatment Directive (76/207). [33030]

Dawn Primarolo: A large number of representations and comments were received, including some referring to the provisions of the Equal Treatment Directive. We are now in the process of reviewing the comments received. The outcome of that review will not be announced before my right hon. Friend's Budget.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the double taxation effect of the proposed catch up charge contained in the proposals to withdraw the cash basis of taxation for professional businesses. [33032]

Dawn Primarolo: We have received a large number of comments and representations on the proposal to withdraw the cash basis practices. A few of these suggested that there was a double taxation effect of the proposed catch up charge, but we do not accept that there is. The catch up charge brings into account, only once, the receipts which would have been included had the business always been taxed on the accruals basis, and which would otherwise escape tax altogether on moving to that basis, because they were earned in an earlier period.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Ms Lawrence) of 22 December 1997, Official Report, column 471, on business profits, in what way the imposition of the catch up charge proposed in the Government's proposals to withdraw the cash basis of taxation for professional businesses (a) corrects an anomaly and (b) creates a level playing field for all businesses. [33200]

Dawn Primarolo: The normal way in which those carrying on a business compute profits for tax is on the 'earnings' or 'accruals' concept under which items are brought into account not as money is received or paid, but as receipts are 'earned' or expenses 'incurred'. However, the Inland Revenue had long-standing published practices under which self-employed people carrying on a business which counts as a 'profession or vocation' may choose a special basis for computing their tax profits, often called a 'cash' basis. Professionals on a cash basis can, subject to certain conditions, compute their tax profits by bringing into account money only as it is received or paid out. Many professional businesses do not adopt a cash basis, but the tax profits of those that do are generally lower than they would be if they were computed on an earnings or accruals basis.

The idea of withdrawal of the cash basis was to level the playing field for all businesses. The catching up charge is necessary to ensure that the transition from cash to accruals basis does not leave out tax receipts, less any expenses, which have not yet been included in their tax returns, but which would have been included if the accruals basis had always applied.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the tax liability of a barrister (a) under the current practice and (b) under the potential future practice under the Government's proposals to withdraw the cash basis of taxation from professional businesses whose earnings correspond with each of the two examples given at Appendix B of the Bar Council's response dated 12 February. [33029]

Dawn Primarolo: The proposal to withdraw the cash basis practices available to professionals was the subject of a consultation process which was started by the issue of an Inland Revenue Press Release on 22 December 1997. Comments were invited by 14 February 1998. Now we are in the process of reviewing the many comments received. The outcome of that review will not be announced before my right hon. Friend's Budget. A barrister's liability under the potential future practice will of course depend on the final shape of the proposal yet to be announced. A comparison at this stage is not therefore possible.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received as to the effect on the taxation of partnerships of the Government's proposals to withdraw the cash basis practice for the taxation of professional businesses. [33031]

Dawn Primarolo: We have received a large number of comments and representations on the proposal to withdraw the cash basis practices. Many of these raised issues about the effect of the proposal on partnerships. Now we are in the process of reviewing the comments received. The outcome of that review will not be announced before my hon. Friend's Budget.

Public Appointments

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many of the appointments to public bodies which he has made since 1 May 1997 have been from the Public Appointments Unit list. [33256]

Mrs. Liddell: Treasury Ministers use a wide range of sources, including the Public Appointments Unit, to identify candidates for public appointments. Of those appointments made since 1 May 1997, one has been identified as having been as a direct result of the PAU list. However there may be other appointees, identified from other sources, who are also on the PAU list.

Housing (VAT Rates)

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 24 February 1998, Official Report, column 132, if he will place in the Library copies of the requests for advice sent to the European Commission as to which government policy measures qualify for a lower rate of VAT because they are defined as the supply, construction, renovation and altering of housing as part of social policy under Annex H of the Sixth VAT Directive and copies of the advice which he received from the European Commission. [33362]

Dawn Primarolo: No. Publication of this correspondence is inappropriate under the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Millennium Compliance

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on progress to date towards (a) millennium compliance and (b) single currency compliance, of the computer systems involved in the introduction of European Monetary Union in the central Governments of each EU member state. [33361]

Mrs. Liddell: The Government have a full programme for ensuring that its computer systems are millennium compliant. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster reports progress to the House regularly. The programme covers all government computer systems including any which relate to the introduction of the euro. Departments that have dealings in foreign currencies are also carrying out work to ensure that they are able to accommodate the introduction of the euro.

The millennium compliance and euro compliance of IT systems involved in the introduction of the single currency in other member states is a matter for the Governments concerned.

Tenants (Tax Liability)

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make the tax liability of tenants for improvement of their property applied to (a) tied cottages and (b) Church of England clergy, the same as that applied to accommodation provided on the basis of being wholly necessary for the discharge of an individual's employment. [33805]

Dawn Primarolo: All employees who are provided with living accommodation by reason of their employment are already subject to the same tax rules in respect of the benefit arising from the provision of that accommodation.

Resuscitation Training Models

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the treatment of resuscitation training models as items of medical equipment for tax purposes. [33793]

Dawn Primarolo: In recent months Treasury Ministers have received representations on the VAT liability of resuscitation training models from St. John Ambulance through nine letters from MPs and a further letter enclosing correspondence from the Royal Free Hospital. In the last year Customs have also received representations from the Charities Tax Reform Group and a number of charities. This matter is now the subject of an appeal to the VAT and Duties Tribunal, which is the proper forum for resolving questions of liability.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what factors underlay the decision by Customs and Excise to withdraw relief from VAT for St. John Ambulance's Resuscitation Training Models under notice 701/6 in March 1997. [33604]

Dawn Primarolo: The supply of training equipment, such as resuscitation training models, has always been subject to VAT. The position was made clear in March 1997 in an updated Public Notice.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what factors underlay the decision to term St. John Ambulance's Resuscitation Training Models as not being items of medical equipment. [33603]

Dawn Primarolo: Customs interpret medical equipment as covering articles required for the purpose of diagnosing or treating injury or illness or the preservation of health.

Duty-free Sales

Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his policy in respect of the duty regime which will apply following the planned abolition of duty free sales in the EU. [33923]

Dawn Primarolo: Operators currently dealing in intra-EU duty free sales will, following abolition, be required to account for duty and tax on the sales they make in accordance with the principles laid down in the relevant EC directives. Customs and Excise are in discussion with UK trade interests to explore the practicalities of implementing this duty paid regime.

Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made towards tax harmonisation in the EU; and what account will be taken of that progress in any decision to abolish duty free in the EU in 1999. [33924]

Dawn Primarolo: The mechanism for progressing harmonisation of excise duty rates on alcohol and tobacco is through the Commission's biennial reviews of the minimum rates of excise duty. Their current reports are overdue.

The decision to end intra-EU duty-free sales has already been taken by the Council of Finance Minister, in 1991. The harmonisation of duties and taxes was not a factor in that decision.

Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the current position of each member state of the EU in respect of commissioning an impact assessment of the effect on employment of abolishing duty free sales in the EU. [33925]

Dawn Primarolo: There was a brief discussion of the matter among Economic and Finance Ministers on 9 March, but I regret that the information in the form sought by my hon. Friend is not available.

Brewing Industry

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people are employed (a) directly and (b) indirectly in the United Kingdom brewing industry. [33913]

Mrs. Liddell: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Chief Executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Lindsay Hoyle, dated 12 March 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your parliamentary question on employment in the brewing industry.

Information from the Annual Employment Survey (AES) shows that at September 1996 there were 24,000 employees in the manufacture of cider and other fruit wines, beer and malt, and 410,000 employees in bars and the retail sale of alcoholic and other beverages. This information is for Great Britain and not the United Kingdom as Northern Ireland estimates are not available at this level of detail.

Pensions Mis-selling

Mr. Timms: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made towards resolving cases of personal pensions mis-selling; and what further action will be taken to see that all those missold a personal pension receive redress. [34007]

Mrs. Liddell: I have today placed in the Library a table showing what further progress has been made in the period up to 28 February 1998 by the 41 firms the Government have been monitoring.

Continuing the trend established in recent months, the table shows that the firms have made further progress during the month, and that about 65 per cent. of the cases identified for review are now completed.

The general trend hides a wide range of different performances. A few firms—8 in all—have yet to complete even half their cases. One is still some way short of the 10 per cent. mark. At the other end of the scale seven of the 41 firms I am monitoring have now completed over three quarters of their cases identified for review.

In previous announcements, I have underlined the importance that both the Government and the regulators attach to all firms, including small firms, taking all possible steps to complete their reviews. I have also made it clear that firms will not escape sanction if they fail to act. That was not an empty threat. Two days ago, the Personal Investment Authority (PIA) announced it was investigating apparent failures to meet the regulator's targets for completing the most urgent case reviews in respect of about 600 small firms, with a view to taking disciplinary action. The firms concerned should have completed at least 90 per cent. of the top priority cases—which include people who are already retired or have died—by the end of December 1997. Far too many small firms appear to have failed to tackle even these most pressing cases. This is simply not acceptable, and PIA's action is to be commended.

As noted above, a number of large firms have resolved over three quarters of their cases. Some of these firms are now getting close to the point where they will have completed their priority cases. This is welcome news. However it highlights the importance of looking forward beyond the first phase of the review of pensions mis-selling. The first step has rightly been to address the more pressing categories of cases, for example the cases of those who are most likely to have lost out and those either in or close to retirement. But they are not the only victims of pensions mis-selling and it is now important to look ahead at how to address the less pressing cases, which have in the past been referred to as "non-priority" cases.

The regulators—Financial Services Authority (FSA) and the PIA—have today issued a consultation document setting out proposals for taking forward the review of personal pensions mis-selling into its second phase. Copies have been placed in the Library. The Government welcome this step forward, which reflects the outcome of research on the extent of the problem.

The document sets out the regulators' proposed approach for firms to tackle the second phase of the review, building on experience of the first phase. It is important to note that this policy is not yet finalised. The way forward must be practicable. It must work. That is why the regulators have chosen to consult.

This is particularly important given that initial research commissioned by the FSA suggests that it will be a large task—potentially involving as many as 1.8 million cases. Whatever the final figures turn out to be, it is clear that the scale is such that it is in everyone's interests that the process adopted is the right one. To that end I urge everyone that is involved or has an interest to participate in the consultation—including investors, occupational pension schemes and of course the firms themselves. In doing that I hope that everyone will make constructive contributions. That is the only way to see that the final policy that the regulators adopt is the best way forward, in the interests of investors and ultimately in the interests of the industry.

GDP Calculation

Mr. Colman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the implications of the proposed change in the calculation of the main figure for GDP from factor cost to market prices. [34001]

Mrs. Liddell: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Chief Executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Tony Colman, dated 12 March 1988:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your parliamentary question on the implications of the proposed changes in the calculation of the main figure for GDP.

From September 1998 the UK will implement the new European System of Accounts (ESA95), both for UK publication and for data provided to Eurostat and other international organisations. As part of this process, GDP at market prices would become the main figure reported for GDP. This is one of a number of changes being considered which would affect the presentation of the UK national accounts. The change to market prices would bring UK practice into line with most other countries and hence help to make international comparisons more meaningful.

The ONS has been consulting users about these changes and intends to announce the outcome of the consultation in a News Release during April.

ECOFIN

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the Council Meeting of the Economic and Finance Ministers of the European Union held on 9 March. [34326]

Mr. Gordon Brown: I chaired the Economic and Finance Council—ECOFIN—of the European Union in Brussels on 9 March. The Economic Secretary represented the UK.

The Council began by discussing its recommendation to the Parliament that they discharge the Budget for 1996. Prof. Friedmann, President of the European Court of Auditors (ECA), gave a full presentation of the key findings from his report on the implementation of the 1996 Budget. Both Commissioner Liikanen and other colleagues responded. Although I was able to congratulate Prof. Friedmann on an excellent and thorough report, and Commissioner Liikanen on the significant steps forward in financial management, I also noted the Council's disappointment that the ECA was again unable to provide us with a positive Statement of Assurance on the implementation of the Budget.

I also drew colleagues' attention to my intention to use the 19 May ECOFIN for a wide-ranging discussion of Community financing issues, including follow-up to the criticisms made in the ECA report, the next Preliminary Draft Budget (for 1999), and the future financing of the Community (on the basis of the Commission's Agenda 2000 proposals).

The Council next considered the follow-up to the code of conduct for business taxation agreed at the 1 December ECOFIN. We agreed the setting up of the assessment group provided for in the code. Commissioner Monti presented his draft directive regarding the taxation of interest and royalty payments between associated companies in different states.

The Council considered a memorandum on a coordinated European response to the challenges posed by the development of electronic commerce. After some contributions from Commissioner Monti and other colleagues, I noted that this was a matter of some interest to ECOFIN, and that we should return to it.

Under the preparation of Stage 3 of EMU, the Council received information from the Presidency, Commission, and Council Secretariat on the timetable for the EMU decision-making process. I also took the opportunity to remind colleagues of the importance of ensuring that national legislation, including the statutes of national central banks, is made compatible with the Treaty requirements for EMU.

On the basis of a presentation from Commissioner de Silguy, and a response from Sir Brian Unwin (President of the European Investment Bank), the Council discussed the principle of the Community guaranteeing EIB lending to Bosnia-Herzegovina. After some discussion, I concluded that there was a broad consensus that the Commission should bring forward a proposal, and noted particularly that some Member States had asked the Commission to keep budget discipline in mind when doing so.

Employment Statistics

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to produce employment and unemployment statistics which can be directly compared with those of the UK's EU partners. [34185]

Mrs. Liddell: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Chief Executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Barry Sheerman, dated 12 March 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your parliamentary question on producing employment and unemployment statistics which can be directly compared with those of the UK's EU partners.

The ONS recently announced major improvements to UK labour market statistics. In recognition of the increasing complexity of the labour market in the United Kingdom, the new ONS presentation will focus on employment, unemployment and inactivity (out of work but not unemployed) as being equally important in describing the changing labour market.

From April 1998, the ONS's assessment will give more weight to the Labour Force Survey, which in future will be published twelve times a year for an average of each three month period. Existing internationally agreed definitions as recommended by the International Labour Organisation (ILO) will continue to be used. Each EU member state is required to carry out a Labour Force Survey on the ILO definitions and the survey results can therefore be directly compared.

A new regulation is due to be adopted by the EU Council of Ministers that will lead to improved harmonisation of employment and unemployment statistics across EU countries on the basis of quarterly Labour Force Surveys.

Women

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the number and the percentage of women who have (i) a dependent child aged (1) 0–4, (2) 5–10 and (3) 11–15 years and (ii) no dependent children who are (a) working full time, (b) working part-time, (c) registered unemployed and (d) economically inactive, indicating separately the numbers of women in each group who are (A) married or living with another person and (B) not married or living with another person. [34002]

Mrs. Liddell: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Chief Executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Denis MacShane, dated 12 March 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your parliamentary question asking for a breakdown of women by economic and marital status and age of youngest dependent child.

This information is shown in the attached table using estimates available from the Labour Force Survey (LFS). The ONS measure of unemployment, derived from the LFS, is defined on a consistent and internationally recognised basis set out by the International Labour Organisation (ILO) and counts as unemployed people who are: a) without a paid job; b) available to start work within the next two weeks and c) have either looked for work in the last four weeks or are waiting to start a job already obtained. The ILO measure of unemployment has been used in this reply instead of "registered unemployed" for consistency with the rest of the table.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list those parliamentary questions he has taken eight weeks or more to answer since 1 May 1997. [32704]

Mrs. Liddell: The eight questions listed did not receive answers within eight weeks of the due date for answer. This represents 0.36 per cent. of the 2,215 written questions tabled to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the present Session.

EU Code of Conduct Group

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the aims and objects of the EU Code of Conduct Group established by ECOFIN. [34031]

Mrs. Liddell: The purpose of the Code of Conduct Group is to assess harmful tax measures which may fall within the scope of the Code of Conduct. The Code itself, which covers business taxation, is designed to curb harmful direct tax measures which may affect in a significant way the location of business in the European Community.

Ecu Bonds

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Government propose to provide for the compulsory conversion of Ecu bonds into Euro bonds by 1 January 1999. [34088]

Mrs. Liddell: All Ecu bonds issued by the UK Government will automatically become denominated in euro at the start of Stage 3 under European Council Regulation No. (EC)1103/97.

Correspondence

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will receive a reply to his letter of 22 January, reference: 0603/15. [34032]

Mr. Gordon Brown: My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury responded on 11 March.

DEFENCE

Gulf (Inoculations)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements have been made to inoculate British forces and medical auxiliaries currently dispatched to the Gulf against (a) anthrax, (b) botulism and (c) chemical weapon agents; what range of insecticides have been sent; and if serving personnel have been given an option not to receive inoculations. [30830]

Dr. Reid: A programme of immunisation against anthrax is currently being offered to UK Service personnel and MOD civilians in the Gulf region. Details of this programme, which whilst strongly recommended is not compulsory were given in the reply by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence to the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) on 3 March 1998, Official Report, column 535. UK forces currently deployed in the Gulf region have been equipped with a range of medical countermeasures against chemical and biological warfare agents. However, no other prophylactic medical countermeasures are currently being used by these forces.

Up to three types of pesticide from Service stocks are available for use by UK forces in the Gulf region, according to their location. These are pyrethroid-based insecticides for general insect control, a bendiocarb-based insecticide cockroach control and difenacoum-based rodenticides.

Riot Control Agents

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what stockpile his Department holds of CR; and for what purpose the material is held; [31274]

(2) what assessment he has made of the United Kingdom's obligations under the Chemical Weapons Convention in his policy on the use of CR; [31269]

(3) where his Department's stockpile of CR is held; and what is the estimated annual cost of storage. [31270]

Dr. Reid: CR gas is a riot control agent designed to cause temporary irritation. The Ministry of Defence currently holds stocks of approximately 260kg for use if necessary by those units responsible for maintaining an effective counter terrorist response capability. This policy is consistent with the Chemical Weapons Convention, which permits the use of certain toxic chemicals for law enforcement purposes. Stocks of CR are held at the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency's Chemical and Biological Defence sector at Porton Down and at the relevant unit level. Figures for the annual cost of storing CR cannot separately be identified.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what stocks of riot control agents are held by his Department; what quantities of each agent are held by his Department; what is the intended purpose of each agent; and where the stocks are held. [33888]

Dr. Reid: CS irritant is the only riot control agent held by my Department. Its purpose is for Nuclear Biological and Chemical Defence training and as a contingency in case the armed forces should ever be asked to support the civil power in riot control. The quantity of CS held is currently under review, although at present it stands at:

1.5 inch Cartridges: 7,209 (+ 14,541 obsolete variants awaiting disposal).

Hand Thrown Grenades: 12,799 (+ 640 obsolete variants or shelf life expired grenades awaiting disposal).

Discharged Grenades: 19,152 (+ 250 shelf life expired grenades awaiting disposal).

A further quantity of 2,500 kilogrammes of CS.

The locations of the agent are being withheld under Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Casualties (Training Exercises)

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British soldiers have been (i) injured and (ii) killed during training exercises in the United Kingdom in each year since 1992 to date. [31740]

Dr. Reid: Figures for the number of deaths and injuries to Army Officers and Soldiers during training exercises for each year since 1992 are provided in the table.

Year	Deaths	Injuries
1992	2	367
1993	1	333

MOD Sites (Wales)

Sir Raymond Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many MoD sites in Wales have been disposed of (i) since 1 May and (ii) between November 1996 and May 1997; and to which bodies. [33697]

Mr. Spellar: The properties in Wales which have been sold and the date are shown in the table. With the exception of the sales of St. David's airfield (January 1997), the sites have been sold to private individuals or companies the details of which are withheld under exemption of 14 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Porton Down

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many times since 1990 the Chemical Defence Establishment at Porton Down has supplied information about former volunteers to the War Pensions Agency when those volunteers have submitted a claim to the Agency. [33803]

Dr. Reid: Since 1990 the Chemical and Biological Defence sector (CBD) of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) has responded to approximately eighty requests from the War Pensions Agency for information relating to former volunteers. CBD also responds to requests received from individual volunteers, their representatives and the Army Historical Branch.

CBD responds to each request for information with all available details from the surviving records and as full an explanation as possible concerning the trials in which the volunteer participated.

Defence Council Instructions

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library a list of the titles and subject matter of the unclassified Defence Council Instructions which were issued between 1 September 1997 and 30 November 1997. [33847]

Mr. Spellar: Yes. I am placing a list today.

NATO Working Papers

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library the NATO working papers agreed at the NATO summit in November 1997. [33677]

Mr. George Robertson: The last NATO Summit took place in Madrid on 8–9 July 1997. The last meetings of NATO Defence Ministers and NATO Foreign Ministers took place in Brussels on 2 and 16 December 1997 respectively. The working papers presented at such meetings are classified documents. Copies of the "Madrid Declaration on Euro-Atlantic Security and Cooperation" issued at the Madrid Summit, and the communiques of the latest meetings of NATO Defence and Foreign Ministers, have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those parliamentary questions he has taken eight weeks or more to answer since 1 May 1997. [32706]

Dr. Reid: There has been one such question. I answered a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) on 17 February 1998, Official Report, column 562. The information he requested was not held centrally and significant effort over a period, including the Christmas break, was required to collate the information that was readily available.

WALES

Training

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much was spent from public funds on training how many people (a) in Wales and (b) in connection with LG companies in 1996–97; and if he will estimate expenditure and numbers in respect of (a) and (b) in (i) 1997–98 and (ii) 1998–99. [33285]

Mr. Hain: Welsh Office expenditure on the main youth and adult training programmes delivered via Training and Enterprise Councils in 1996–97 amounted to £83.2 million and covered 37,734 starts by people on the programmes. Comparable provision in the current financial year amounts to £86.1 million and it is estimated that, by the outturn, there will have been some 31,540 starts. For 1998–99, the equivalent figures are £77 million and 29,000 starts, although target activity and funding levels are subject to on-going contractual negotiations with the TECs. These figures do not include training linked to TEC funding from their Business Growth and Start-Up budget and Local Initiative Fund, or training under the New Deal.

No public funds were spent on training in connection with LG companies in 1996–97. The above figures for 1997–98 and 1998–99 include 32 Modern Apprentices in training linked to LG companies, supported by Welsh Office funding of £50,000 in 1997–98 and £125,000 in 1998–99. In addition, in 1997–98, Gwent TEC has been allocated £2 million for the training of 547 people from LG companies. The equivalent figures for 1998–99 are £6 million for 1,660 people. Finally, LG (Electronics) has free occupancy of a Welsh Development Agency building to use as a training centre for 3 years. The value of this is estimated at some £206,000 a year for 1997–98 and 1998–99. The costs of training at the Centre are being met by LG (Electronics), drawing on the funding assistance noted above.

Contaminated Land

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of hectares of contaminated land in each of the last 12 years in each county by region. [33037]

Mr. Win Griffiths: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him by the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) on Friday 6 March 1998, Official Report, columns 812–13.

Schools

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of the number of schoolchildren from England receiving education in Welsh schools. [33280]

Mr. Hain: The information requested is not available centrally.

Transport Links

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how he proposes to upgrade (a) road, (b) rail and (c) air links in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [33533]

Mr. Hain: The role that all transport modes should play in improving transport links is being considered as part of our plans to develop an integrated transport policy. The consultation exercise launched last August will lead to a UK-wide White Paper on transport later this year. At around the same time, a Welsh Transport Policy Statement will be published drawing out those issues of particular relevance and importance to Wales. I am meanwhile conducting a series of consultations on air and rail links between North and South Wales.

Coal Industry

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the future of the coal industry in Wales. [33527]

Mr. Hain: The Government are currently undertaking a full review of energy policy including the position of coal within it. The future of the Welsh coal industry depends on a number of factors, including the ability to compete and the availability of markets. These issues were considered at the Coal Workshop in Cardiff last December, the report of which will be issued for comment shortly.

Empty Housing

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many vacant dwellings there are in each local housing authority in Wales. [33526]

Mr. Win Griffiths: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Brake) on 2 March 1998, Official Report, column 4.

Long-term Unemployed

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many long-term unemployed people there are in Wales, by each Parliamentary constituency. [33535]

Mr. Hain: The information requested is given in the table, and is available from the NOMIS database, which can be accessed by the staff of the Library of the House.

Tourism

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what tourism initiatives he is undertaking in respect of (a) accommodation schemes and quality standards, (b) promoting Wales, (c) trade communication, (d) market and product intelligence and research, (e) training and (f) market access and information. [33812]

Mr. Hain: The Wales Tourist Board is responsible for a range of initiatives under its "Tourism 2000" strategy which are aimed at these areas. The Board is in the process of reviewing and updating its strategy to ensure that it continues to meet the needs of the industry into the future.

Housing Department

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he will announce the outcome of his consultation on the new housing department within the Welsh Office. [34539]

Mr. Win Griffiths: We have sought powers in the Government of Wales Bill to wind up Tai Cymru and transfer its functions to the Secretary of State for Wales. We intend to transfer these functions to the Assembly when it is established.

In my written reply to my hon. Friend of 4 December 1997, Official Report, column 306, I announced the setting up of a new Housing Department of the Welsh Office to combine all of the existing functions of Tai Cymru and the Welsh Office Housing Division. I also announced the issue of a consultation paper on the organisation and role of the Housing Department and its relations with other bodies including an enhanced role for local authorities in planning the provision of housing in their areas. Copies of the consultation paper "Streamlined, Efficient, Accountable: A New Housing department for Wales" were placed in the Library of the House.

Consultation ended on 23 January. There were 52 responses. Our proposals were widely supported. My right hon. Friend and I have therefore decided to confirm the proposals set out in the paper.

A number of the responses raised particular points about the way in which the new Department will operate and its relations with other bodies. We shall bear these in mind as we are putting the new organisation together.

A list of respondents has been placed in the Library of the House.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those parliamentary questions he has taken eight weeks or more to answer since 1 May 1997. [32718]

Mr. Ron Davies: There are no parliamentary questions that my Department has taken eight weeks or more to answer since 1 May 1998.

Elective Surgery (Bro Taf)

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the Chairman of the Bro Taf Health Authority in relation to the suspension of major elective surgery for the remainder of the 1997–98 financial year. [34172]

Mr. Ron Davies: None. Contractual issues are management responsibilities for health authorities and their provider hospitals.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Exports (Kenya)

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many licence applications have been granted in the past five years for the export of tear gas and plastic bullets to Kenya. [24331]

Mrs. Roche: These goods, and others, are controlled under different entries in Part 1 of Schedule III to the Export of Goods (Control) Order which are known as the ratings for these goods: tear gas under entry ML7; and plastic bullets under entries ML3 or PL5021.

The Export Control Organisation's computer databases have been interrogated, and the following results were obtained. Between 1 January 1992 and 12 January 1998, 73 standard individual export licences were issued for the export to end users or consignees in Kenya of goods with these ratings. 61 of these licences covered goods rated ML3 and 12 covered goods rated PL5021; none covered goods rated ML7. Between 1 January 1994 and 12 January 1998, one Open Individual Export Licence was issued for the export to end users or consignees in Kenya of goods rated ML3 and none covering goods rated

ML7 or PL5021. The paper record of this case has been examined and the licence did not cover tear gas or plastic bullets.

This information should be considered in light of the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint) on 30 October 1997, Official Report, columns 870–71.

Information on Open Individual Export Licences issued before 1 January 1994 could be provided only at disproportionate cost. It would also entail disproportionate cost to determine which, if any, of the standard individual export licences set out above covered the specified goods.

Goods with the relevant ratings may also have been exported to Kenya under the following Open General Export licences: OGEL (export after repair: military goods) and OGEL (export after exhibition: military goods), both of which were first issued on 1 March 1994.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what licences have been granted for the export of tear gas, plastic bullets and other security equipment to Kenya; and to which units in Kenya these transfers were destined. [28839]

Mrs. Roche: The entry in the legislation under which the export of goods is controlled is known as their rating. The export of tear gas is controlled under entry ML7 of Part III of Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods (Control) Order (the so-called "Military List"), and that of plastic bullets under entries ML3 or PL5021. Certain security and paramilitary police goods are specified under entry PL5001, but other goods with possible security uses may be controlled under various other entries in the Military List.

The Export Control Organisation's computer databases have been interrogated and the results are as follows. Between 1 January 1992 and 12 January 1998, 380 standard individual licences were issued for the export to end users or consignees in Kenya of goods described on the Military List. Between 1 January 1994 and 12 January 1998, 49 Open Individual Export Licences were issued for such exports. None of these licences covered goods rated ML7. Individual export licences can cover a range of goods, controlled under several entries in the legislation. Where this is so the licence is included in the Table in the total shown against each of the relevant ratings.

[2] Issued between 1 January 1994 and 12 January 1998 covering the export to Kenya of goods with this rating.

In addition, 48 Media OIELs were issued during the period. Media OIELs are a special category of Open Individual Export Licence authorising the export to any destination of protective clothing, mainly for the protection of aid agency workers and journalists when working in areas of conflict.

This information should be considered in light of the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint) on 30 October 1997, Official Report, columns 870–71.

It would entail disproportionate cost to determine which, if any of the licences set out in the table covered the specified goods, or to identify the end users in each case.

Goods with the relevant ratings may also have been exported to Kenya under the following Open General Export licences: OGEL (export after repair: military goods) and OGEL (export after exhibition: military goods), both of which were first issued on 1 March 1994.

Officials (Telephone Calls)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what departmental guidelines are issued regarding her officials returning telephone calls from members of the public. [31956]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: The DTI is committed to providing a high quality of service to all its contacts. Staff are expected to deal with telephone calls in an efficient, effective and courteous manner, and this includes ensuring that calls from members of the public are returned. Tailored training is available for staff to help them meet this requirement. Consideration will also be given to introducing guidelines on call handling as part of the induction process for new staff.

Arms Exports (Indonesia)

Ann Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many applications for licences for the export of military equipment to Indonesia have been (a) granted, (b) refused and (c) revoked since 13 November 1997. [32848]

Mrs. Roche: The Export Control Organisation's computer databases have been interrogated and the results are as follows for the period between 13 November 1997 and 6 February 1998 in respect of applications for individual licences to export to endusers or consignees in Indonesia goods controlled by Part III of Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods (Control) Order (the so-called "Military List").

This information should be considered in light of my answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint) on 30 October 1997, Official Report, columns 870–71.

Two of the standard individual export licences included in the table were issued on 13 November, and so are also included in the table in my answer to the hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), on 2 December 1997, Official Report, columns 124–26.

Arms Sales

Sir Richard Body: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make it her policy to disaggregate figures for ECGD guarantees relating to the export of lethal weapons from other defence-related business in statistics for future years. [32816]

Mrs. Roche: ECGD already provides a disaggregation in its annual report of new guarantees in respect of defence-related equipment between military aircraft, vehicles, naval vessels, communications and ancillary equipment.

Environmental Protection and Waste Management Technology

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assistance her Department provided to British firms to help them participate in the ENVITEC Environmental Protection and Waste Management Technology Trade Fair held in Düsseldorf in March. [33027]

Mrs. Roche: The industry put in a very late bid for support which was considered carefully by the DTI. On balance, a decision was taken not to accept it. However, we expect to support nine other environmental events in the coming year.

Pharmaceuticals

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the impact of the loss of resale price maintenance on over-the-counter medicines on the pharmacy sector. [33489]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: The Director General of Fair Trading has published details in his January 1998 report "Material Changes in the Medicaments Market since 1970", a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House.

The report shows that branded over-the-counter medicines are estimated to account for up to 8 per cent. of chemists' turnover in 1995, compared with up to 13 per cent. in 1970, and that the proportion of turnover accounted for by regulated NHS business has increased from 35 per cent. to 45 per cent. in 1970 to around 70 per cent. in 1995.

Heinz (Wigan)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations she has received on the negotiating right of the MSF union at Heinz factory, Wigan; and if she will make a statement. [33968]

Mr. Ian McCartney: I have received no representations on this matter.

Market Access (Taiwan)

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make a statement on the outcome of the recent EU Taiwan market access negotiations. [33882]

Mrs. Roche: The 12th round of market access negotiations between the European Union and Taiwan relating to Taiwan's accession to the World Trade Organisation was held between 24–26 February in Taipei. The European Commission will formally report back on the talks to Member States in Brussels on 13 March. Our understanding from initial reports is that good progress was reached in a wide range of areas but that agreement has still to be reached on a number of issues, notably on Taiwan's taxation of alcoholic spirits and in particular of Scotch Whisky where the UK has a strong interest. UK officials will continue to keep in close contact with the European Commission on this issue and to work hard towards a mutually acceptable solution.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will list those parliamentary questions she has taken eight weeks or more to answer since 1 May 1997. [32717]

Mrs. Beckett: Since the State Opening of Parliament on 14 May, three questions have received answers eight weeks or more after the due date. These were question 1117 from the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), 31 July 1997, Official Report column 630; question 12695 from the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Mr. Taylor), 22 December 1997, Official Report, column 517; question 13042 from the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), 12 February 1998, Official Report, column 393.

Foreign Shareholdings

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make a statement about the requests from British Aerospace plc and Rolls-Royce plc for changes to their foreign shareholding limits. [34678]

Mr. Battle: The Government as holders of the special shares in British Aerospace plc and Rolls-Royce plc, have today agreed to the changes requested by these two companies.

When British Aerospace and Rolls-Royce were privatised, a limit was imposed on total foreign shareholdings in each company, in order to maintain UK control of these companies because of their strategic importance to the UK's defence interests. These limits can be varied only with the consent of the Government, under the powers of the special share which it holds in each company. These foreign shareholding limits are currently set at 29.5 per cent. and the companies have now proposed that these limits be increased to 49.5 per cent., together with a new limit of 15 per cent. on any individual foreign shareholder. These revised limits will take effect only if they are also approved by the shareholders of the two companies. I understand that resolutions to make these changes will now be put to the forthcoming Annual General Meetings of the respective shareholders of both companies.

These changes are designed to promote the competitiveness of these companies, by increasing their freedom to operate commercially in world markets.

Mauritius

Dr. Marek: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to her answer of 6 March 1998, Official Report, column 808, for what reason the visit to Mauritius by one of her junior ministers has been cancelled. [34187]

Mrs. Roche: I was planning to visit Mauritius in April. Unfortunately an ACP/EU Parliamentary meeting was re-scheduled which coincided with the dates of this visit. Given that the Mauritian authorities would inevitably be fully engaged in hosting this important meeting which will be attended by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development, it was decided that it was best to postpone my visit. I hope to be able to visit at a later date.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Millennium Compliance

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he or his Ministers last met a Treasury Minister to discuss the costs of millennium compliance in his Department. [32296]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 3 March 1998]: Neither I nor my Ministerial colleagues have met a Treasury Minister to discuss the costs of Year 2000 compliance in my Department.

A Ministerial group is chaired by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to drive action across the public and private sector. Her Majesty's Treasury are represented on this group and my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) represents my Department.

Hunting

Mr. Caplin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received on the implications of the Wild Mammals (Hunting with Dogs) Bill for the UK's adherence to the European Convention on Human Rights; if he will place copies of such representations in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [33474]

Mr. George Howarth: I will write to my hon. Friend.

Prisons (Foreign Nationals)

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many foreign nationals who received a prison sentence were deported on completion of their sentence, in each of the last five years for which figures are available. [33680]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Regrettably, the information requested is available only at disproportionate cost through the examination of individual case files.

The available information relates to persons removed from the United Kingdom under the deportation process following a court recommendation, or on grounds conducive to the public good having been convicted of a criminal offence, and is set out in the table. The data may include cases where no prison sentence was served. Removals under illegal entry and port refusal procedures are excluded.

Persons removed[1] [2] from the United Kingdom under the deportation process following a court recommendation, or on grounds conducive to the public good having been convicted of a criminal offence[3], 1994 to 1997[4]

	Number of persons[5]

[1] Includes voluntary departures after deportation action had been initiated.
[2] Excludes removals under illegal entry and port procedures.
[3] Where the court did not make a recommendation for deportation.
[4] 1997 data are provisional.
[5] May include persons who did not serve a custodial sentence.

Restorative Justice

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the impact of measures contained in the Crime and Disorder Bill [Lords] on restorative justice initiatives being undertaken at present. [33678]

Mr. Michael: The Government believe that offenders—especially young offenders—should be made to face up to the impact of their offences on other people. We are following closely the development of restorative justice both in this country and abroad and recognise that, in appropriate circumstances, this approach may well be able to provide a useful tool for addressing law and order problems, particularly where young people are involved. We welcome the work to develop these ideas, such as that undertaken by the Thames Valley Police and the Northamptonshire Diversion Scheme.

We plan to reflect existing best practice in guidance to support the implementation of the new Final Warning Scheme introduced by the Bill. The new Reparation Order also introduced by the Bill and our proposals for reform of the youth court, set out in the White Paper "No More Excuses", are likewise consistent with the principles of restorative justice.

Birmingham Six

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the outstanding issues relating to the compensation payments to the men wrongly convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings have been resolved; when his officials last met representatives of the men to discuss compensation; what interim payments have been made to date to them; and what factors underlie the length of time taken to finalise the compensation. [33597]

Mr. Michael: Final assessments of the amount of compensation payable were made some time ago by the independent assessor; in March 1995 in the cases of five of the men, and in the sixth case in July 1996. These have not been accepted. Significant interim payments have been made in all six cases, but it is not the practice to disclose the amount of such payments in individual cases. The assessor has considered further representations on behalf of all six men: the outcome of his consideration of the most recent representations in the cases of five of the men was communicated to their representatives last August and we await their response. The assessor has just completed his consideration of representations on behalf of the sixth man, and my officials will write to his representatives shortly. My officials have not met representatives of the six men to discuss compensation; nor would such a meeting be appropriate as the assessment of the amount of compensation payable is solely a matter for the independent assessor.

Publications

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those European Commission (a) newsletters, (b) magazines and (c) occasional publications to which his Department subscribes. [33661]

Mr. Straw: The titles of magazines, newsletters and occasional publications published by the Commission of the European Communities and subscribed to by the Home Office are listed.

Immigration Service

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total cost in the current year of the UK Immigration Service. [33875]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Immigration Service consists of the Ports Directorate and the Enforcement Directorate within the Immigration and Nationality Directorate. Their expected expenditure out-turn for 1997–98 is £92.3 million (gross) and £42.4 million respectively. Additional expenditure on some support costs is met centrally.

Criminal Cases Review Commission

Mr. Plaskitt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases have been completed by the Criminal Cases Review Commission to date; how many cases are (i) currently under investigation and (ii) have been referred and are still pending; what has been the average length of time taken to complete each case; and in how many cases investigated to date the person originally convicted had died prior to the Commission taking up the case. [33598]

Mr. Michael: At the end of February, the Criminal Cases Review Commission had completed 288 cases, was substantively reviewing 215 cases, and had done preliminary work on a further 749. In 222 of the 288, the Commission had determined that the applicant did not meet the eligibility criteria laid down by the Criminal Appeal Act 1995. Of the remaining 66, the Commission had decided to refer 12 to an appeal court, of which two have so far been heard. The average length of time taken to complete the 66 cases was 108 days. In three completed cases, and two cases currently being reviewed, the person originally convicted had died before the Commission took up the case.

Political Publicity

Mr. Plaskitt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions have been brought under section 2A of the Local Government Act 1986 to date. [33623]

Mr. Michael: The Court Proceedings database, held centrally, does not separately identify proceedings under section 2A of the Local Government Act 1986, as amended by section 28 of the Local Government Act 1988. However, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions advise that they are not aware of any prosecutions brought under section 28.

Speeding Offences

Mr. Plaskitt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many convictions in respect of offences of speeding on the motorway network have been secured in each of the last four years. [33624]

Mr. Michael: The information requested is not separately identifiable in the statistics collected centrally.

All Ports Warning System

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy towards the use of the All Ports Warning System to detect the departure from the United Kingdom of people included in that system. [34167]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The All Ports Warning System has had only limited success as a means of detecting departing passengers who are included in that system. I believe that there is potential for operating the system much more efficiently and effectively and this is something which my officials are currently examining.

Illegal Immigrants

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the contribution of immigration checks to the detection of illegal immigrants. [34168]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Experience has shown that it is highly ineffective and wasteful of resources to use such checks as a means of pursuing inquiries in individual cases. For many years now, and to much greater effect, enforcement inquiries have been intelligence based.

Passenger Checks

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what obligations carriers have to check the documents of passengers departing from the United Kingdom. [34169]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Convention on International Civil Aviation requires airlines to ensure that embarking passengers have the correct documentation—passports, visas etc—for their journey.

Seat Belts

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prosecutions have been successfully brought against those persons who have failed to ensure that children are wearing suitable restraints or seat belts in cars, in each of the past 10 years; [34148]

(2) how many successful prosecutions have been brought against adults who have failed to wear seat belts as (a) drivers and (b) passengers in each of the past 10 years. [34147]

Mr. Michael: It is not possible, in the statistics held centrally, to distinguish between passengers and drivers prosecuted for not wearing seat belts, or whether children are involved.

The table gives the available information. As the majority of seat belt offences are dealt with by the issue of a fixed penalty notice, these are also included in the table, although the numbers of fixed penalties paid for these particular offences are not available centrally (around 65 per cent. of all fixed penalties issued where the driver is present are paid).

Driving or riding in a motor vehicle while not wearing a seat belt England and Wales, 1987–1996

1991	9,856	n/a
1992	8,503	102,322
1993	7,083	106,153
1994	6.597	114,712

Police Discipline Appeals

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions the holder of his office has been successfully challenged over the last five years over a ruling which he has given in a police disciplinary case. [34095]

Mr. Michael: There have been 295 police discipline appeals determined during the last five years. Eleven applications for judicial review have arisen from these decisions of which two were successful and one is still proceeding.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions in the last five years the holder of his office has overruled the recommendations of tribunals in police discipline cases. [34094]

Mr. Michael: Since April 1994, which is as far back as reliable statistics are available, the Home Secretary has not accepted the recommendations of tribunals appointed to consider police discipline appeals in 27 out of 169 cases (approximately 1 in 6). The figures for each year are shown.

	Against tribunal	Total dealt with by tribunal	Total appeal cases determined
1994–95	3	35	48

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those parliamentary questions he has taken eight weeks or more to answer since 1 May 1997. [32711]

Mr. Straw: There have been no parliamentary questions which we have taken eight weeks or more to answer since 1 May 1997.

European Elections

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 9 March 1998, Official Report, columns 17–18, to the hon. Member for Basildon (Angela Smith), what evidence he had estimated in support of his statement concerning the failure of voter preferences for individual candidates to be translated into electoral success under the Belgium electoral system prior to his comments on the Belgian electoral system on 25 November. [34189]

Mr. George Howarth: As my right hon. Friend said during the Second Reading debate on the European Parliamentary Elections Bill on 25 November 1997, Official Report, columns 803–17, he had looked at the operation of the Belgian electoral system. He recognised that, by the very nature of the way the system operates, those candidates who gained the most personal votes would not necessarily be elected.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 9 March 1998, Official Report, columns 17–18, to the hon. Member for Basildon (Angela Smith), (a) when the numerical examples he has placed in the Library were worked out and (b) when he received them. [34188]

Mr. George Howarth: The numerical examples were worked out by Home Office officials on 6 March and received by my right hon. Friend on the same day.

Immigration Detainees

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) suicides and (b) attempted suicides have been recorded amongst immigration detainees in each year since 1992; and if he will make a statement. [33749]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: There have been no suicides in immigration detention centres since 1992. One immigration detainee committed suicide in Her Majesty's Prison Norwich on 25 August 1995, where he had completed a prison sentence and was awaiting deportation.

Information concerning those who may have attempted suicide is not available in the form requested. However, statistics concerning incidents of self-harm in immigration detention accommodation are reproduced in the table. It is not possible to say how many, if any, of the incidents can be regarded as attempted suicide.

Information concerning incidents of self-harm in relation to immigration detainees held in Prison Service accommodation is available only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions have taken place between officials of the Immigration Service and Group 4 concerning treatment of detainees; and what specialist training is given to staff involved with detainees. [33842]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Discussions between the Immigration Service and Group 4 about the management of Detention Centres are routine and regular. Immigration Service staff based at centres provide routine monitoring of performance against contracts and, in the case of Campsfield House, there is thorough external monitoring under the provisions of the IS 9002 quality assurance programme. In addition, senior staff pay regular visits to Detention Centres and have discussions with local managers and company directors.

All personnel employed by Group 4 [Total Security] Limited are required to undergo a training programme which includes duty of care, health and safety, suicide prevention, security management, race relations, cultural and ethnic considerations and first aid.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the dates on which disturbances took place at Campsfield House between January 1993 and July 1997 and in each case the numbers of detainees involved, the action taken by security staff, police and immigration officials and the subsequent Ministerial action. [33843]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Campsfield House immigration detention centre opened on 29 November 1993. Up until July 1997, there had been 4 incidents best described as disturbances.

Dates	Nature of incident	Number of detainees
24 December 1993	Concerted indiscipline	40–50
5–6 June 1994	Concerted indiscipline	60–70
29 November 1996	Rooftop protest	1
21 May 1997	Rooftop protest	16

The incidents of concerted indiscipline which occurred in 1993 and 1994 required the presence of officers from Thames Valley Police to restore order. As a result of these incidents, the then Chief Inspector of Prisons, Judge Stephen Tumim, was invited by the former Home Secretary to inspect Campsfield House. His report, which was published on 21 April 1995, included a number of recommendations which were implemented at Campsfield House.

The remaining disturbances did not necessitate a large scale police presence and were successfully resolved by the centre contractors, Group 4 Total Security Limited.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the detention costs per head of each immigration detention centre for each of the last three years; and what was the average cost of (i) prison and (ii) police station detention per head for the same period. [33750]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The information requested is in the table. Costs are per person per week, and include headquarters overheads. Costs for the 1997–98 financial year are based on estimated outturns.

[1] Not yet available.

The costs for Meadvale Buildings (a temporary facility near Gatwick Airport) in 1995/96 and Tinsley House in 1996/97 reflect the start-up costs and phased build-up of these centres.

The sharp rise in unit costs at Campsfield House in 1997/98 is a result of reduced capacity, to about half, and increased security costs resulting from the disturbances there in August 1997. Once the centre is operating at full capacity, unit costs there will fall in line with previous years.

The figure for detention in police cells is a weighted average across all forces. Detention of people under Immigration Act powers in police cells is limited to a maximum of five days, or seven if removal directions have been given.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what date the review of asylum and immigration detention was announced; from whom submissions were sought; if he will list the organisations and individuals that have responded; and when he plans to make a statement on future policy. [33841]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The review of detention was commissioned in May 1997. At the beginning of September, I wrote to 12 non-governmental organisations inviting their comments on the major policy areas covered by the review. Submissions were received from the following groups:

United Nations High Commission for Refugees

Amnesty International

Immigration Advisory Service

The Law Society

The Refugee Council

Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants

Churches Commission for Racial Justice

Refugee Legal Centre

Charter 87

Immigration Law Practitioners Association

The Medical Foundation

Justice.

A number of other bodies put forward submissions on this issue, both before and during the review.

The findings of the review are currently being considered and I expect to announce the results in due course.

Gambling

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to raise the minimum age for playing slot machines and scratchcards to 18 years. [34155]

Mr. George Howarth: There is already a minimum age of 18 for £10 all-cash amusement-with-prizes machines in amusement arcades.

There are no current plans to extend this limit to machine gambling generally or to raise the age limit for scratchcards. However, the Government keep the age limits under review.

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what evidence he has evaluated in respect of the numbers of people under the age of 18 years playing Pronto. [34160]

Mr. George Howarth: None.

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what evidence he has evaluated concerning under age gambling on slot machines in public houses; and what action he proposes to take as a result. [34154]

Mr. George Howarth: There is no minimum legal age for machine gambling in public houses.

Dr. Sue Fisher's report for OFLOT on young people's gambling, published last month, was based on a survey last summer of 9,774 schoolchildren aged 12–15 years.

Thirty per cent. said they had played amusement-with-prizes machines (commonly known as fruit machines) in the past week, 19 per cent. with their own money. Of the 19 per cent., 44 per cent. had played machines in public houses.

Four per cent. of the total were identified as problem fruit machine gamblers.

We are carefully considering the implications of Dr. Fisher's study and whether we should take any action as a result.

Lotteries (Frequent Draws) Bill

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the likely financial impact on the voluntary sector of his Draft Lotteries (Frequent Draws) Bill. [34156]

Mr. George Howarth: The likely effect of the draft Bill on the voluntary sector's fundraising capacity is one of the factors we will consider in evaluating the response to the consultation on it.

We aim to report the outcome of the consultation shortly.

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is still receiving submissions in respect of his Draft Lotteries (Frequent Draws) Bill; when the last submission was received; and if those received after 13 February will be considered. [34157]

Mr. George Howarth: The last submission was received on 4 March. All submissions received to date will be taken into account.

Police Statistics

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the (a) population served, (b) geographical area served and (c) strength of each police force in England and Wales and the ratio of (c) in each force area to (a) and (b); and what is the ratio of police offices (i) per head of the population and (ii) to geographical area in (1) England and (2) Wales. [33990]

Mr. Michael: The information requested is set out in the table.

HEALTH

UN Convention on the Rights of the Child

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to withdraw or alter the reservations and declaration by the United Kingdom Government regarding the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. [24344]

Mr. Boateng: During 1998 the Government will be preparing the Second United Kingdom Report to the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child in accordance with the requirements of Article 44 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, 1989. That process will also allow a review of the original reasons for the UK's reservations to the Convention made in 1991 and to what extent they remain valid in 1998. One particular reservation with respect to Article 37(d) was withdrawn by the previous Government on 18 April 1997.

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to involve young people in the process of preparing the Government's response to the report on the United Kingdom's performance in implementing the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. [24341]

Mr. Boateng: During 1998 the Government will be preparing the Second United Kingdom Report to the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child in accordance with the requirements of Article 44 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, 1989. Early in that process there will be a UK wide launch conference at which children will be making a presentation. The advice of government departments and non-governmental organisations closely involved with children is being sought to ensure that children's views are reflected in the report's preparation.

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on (a) central and (b) local government progress in implementing the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. [24335]

Mr. Boateng: During 1998 the Government will be preparing the Second United Kingdom Report to the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child in accordance with the requirements of Article 44 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, 1989. The main focus of the report will be central and local government progress in implementing the Convention. The report will be publicly available early in 1999.

Children's Rights Officers

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans the Government have to extend the network of children's rights officers. [24334]

Mr. Boateng: We have no such plans. Children's rights officers are usually appointed by local authorities. There is no statutory requirement that authorities should have such a post and it is up to each authority to determine the priority for this type of development.

Minister for Children

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the Government will establish a Minister for Children. [24337]

Mr. Boateng: We have no plans to establish a Minister for Children with responsibilities for England. There are already systems in place to ensure cross-departmental co-operation in areas of shared interest. The Scottish and Welsh Offices have appointed Ministers for Children, but in their case, unlike in England, all social affairs responsibilities rest in the same department.

National Health Service Budget

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of the NHS budget is spent on (a) maternity services, (b) infertility treatment, (c) joint replacement and (d) immunisation prior to visits abroad. [29278]

Mr. Boateng: In 1996–97 4.2 per cent. of the total National Health Service budget was spent on maternity services. At present, information on specific expenditure on infertility treatment, joint replacement, and immunisation prior to visits abroad, is not collected centrally.

Sheep Dips

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action his Department has taken to ensure that doctors are aware of the contents of the leaflet "Sheep Dipping" published by HSE, VMD, MAFF and Department of Environment (9AS 29 (rev) 3/95 C250). [32057]

Ms Jowell: We have been advised that the leaflet AS29 issued by the Health and Safety Executive and the Veterinary Medicines Directorate (Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food) has recently been revised and the latest version is to be launched on 12 March. It is aimed at farmers and primarily gives advice on the safe use and disposal of sheep dips. The leaflet also refers to issues of health surveillance of people regularly using organophosphate sheep dips. We would expect occupational hygienists or occupational health professionals to be better placed to assist farmers on these matters than local general practitioners or hospitals. If contractors or employers need advice on health surveillance of employees, the HSE Employment Medical Advisory Service can and does provide it.

However, the Department has taken steps to increase awareness among medical practitioners. The Chief Medical Officers have written to doctors on a number of occasions since 1991 to remind them of the possibility of adverse effects from exposure to pesticides and certain veterinary medicines and to remind them of the reporting schemes. We are currently considering whether any further action may be necessary to advise doctors in this area and I will write to the hon. Member when a decision has been taken.

Malnutrition

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of British children suffer from malnutrition; and what was the figure in 1990. [32550]

Ms Jowell: Malnutrition can mean over-nourishment as well as under-nourishment. As there is no clearly defined or accepted definition of malnutrition, the Department does not have information in the form requested.

Nevertheless, the nutritional status of children can be assessed in several ways. The most widely adopted measure is height. An increase in height indicates an improvement in the nutrition of children. A continuous survey of English and Scottish children aged 5–11 years between 1972 to 1994 showed a year by year increase in the average height of all age groups. The same survey showed an increase in the mean weight for height index (an indicator of fatness) since about 1982, especially in girls. Another measure of fatness is Body Mass Index (BMI) and a recent survey indicated that the BMI of English children aged 2–15 years was generally higher than the 1990 reference figures. This indicates that children are generally getting fatter which represents an unsatisfactory trend.

The Health Survey for England 1996 provides some information on anaemia in children, which can be caused by iron deficiency. It indicated that in the 12–14 age group, about 3 per cent. of white boys and girls might have had an iron deficiency. A survey in 1992–93 of British children aged between $1\frac{1}{2}$ and $4\frac{1}{2}$ years indicated that over 8 per cent. might have been deficient in iron. However, there is no comparable information for 1990. The problems of deficiencies of iron are being investigated to identify how best to prevent the disorder in all population groups.

Trust Boards (South Yorkshire)

Mr. Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many directors serve on National Health Trust Boards operating in (a) Doncaster and (b) Barnsley; and how many of those directors reside in the Barnsley, East and Mexborough constituency. [33207]

Mr. Milburn: The current non-executive directors serving on the boards of National Health Service trusts operating in Barnsley and Doncaster are shown in the tables. Information is not held centrally on the parliamentary constituencies in which directors reside.

Ante-natal and Maternity Care

Mr. Wood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many district health authorities require women to pay for ante-natal or maternity care. [33367]

Mr. Boateng: The National Health Service provides all clinically necessary ante-natal and maternity care free of charge. Some NHS trusts may offer private tests which are not provided because they are not clinically effective or deemed to be clinically necessary by the NHS.

Public Appointments

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many of the appointments to public bodies which he has made since 1 May 1997 have been from the Public Appointments Unit list. [33247]

Mr. Milburn: Of the appointments made to the Department's public bodies since 1 May 1997, five have been candidates whose names were obtained from the Public Appointments Unit's list. When seeking nominations for candidates for appointments to public bodies we use a wide range of sources, of which the Public Appointments Unit is one, to ensure that there is the widest possible dissemination of information about vacancies.

Accident and Emergency Services, Solihull

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent change there has been in the arrangements for the provision of accident and emergency services at Solihull Hospital. [33461]

Mr. Milburn: Following a meeting on 18 February, the Royal College of Surgeons decided to withdraw accreditation for the training of junior doctors at Solihull Hospital's Accident and Emergency Department, with effect from the end of July 1998. The Birmingham Heartlands and Solihull National Health Service Trust plans to replace the doctors in training with fully qualified doctors to enable the service to continue as before.

Community Pharmacists

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has evaluated into the financial savings to the NHS of healthcare advice provided by community pharmacists; and what estimate he has made of the impact on NHS costs of the closures of community pharmacies over the last three years. [33475]

Mr. Milburn: Pharmacists provide a most useful service to the community through the provision of advice, particularly on minor or common ailments. We have made no evaluation of potential financial savings to the National Health Service of healthcare advice given to patients by community pharmacists.

The overall number of community pharmacies in England and Wales has remained virtually unchanged over the last three years. It is difficult to estimate the cost, if any, to the NHS of any particular closures that have occurred during this period.

Mrs. Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what data his Department has collected on the numbers of people without access to public transport who use community pharmacies. [33741]

Mr. Milburn: None.

Departmental Buildings

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the cost of (a) the original refurbishment of Richmond House as the Department of Health headquarters and (b) refurbishing (i) Skipton House and (ii) Quarry House, Leeds, in each of the last 10 years. [33675]

Ms Jowell: The refurbishment of Richmond House for the Department of Health and Social Security in 1988–89 was undertaken by the Property Services Agency. Details of the costs incurred are not held by the Department.

Skipton House was acquired by the Department in 1992. The costs of fitting out the shell and core were £14,735,000 in 1992–93 and £1,192,000 in 1993–94. Subsequent expenditure on the building structure and services, excluding routine maintenance, was £368,115 in 1994–95, £500,619 in 1995–96 and £543,394 in 1996–97.

Quarry House, Leeds, was purpose built for joint occupation by the Department of Health and the Department of Social Security (who met the costs of construction and fit-out). It was first occupied in 1992–93 since when the Department of Social Security has been responsible for managing the building. Expenditure on the building structure and services by the Department of Health on the accommodation that it occupies was nil in 1993–94 and 1994–95, £139,000 in 1995–96 and £180,000 in 1996–97.

Publications

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those European Commission (a) newsletters, (b) magazines and (c) occasional publications to which his Department subscribes. [33652]

Ms Jowell: These European Commission publications are taken on subscription by the Department:

Basic statistics of the European Union (annual)

General report on the activities of the European Union (annual)

Journal of the European Communities:

Series C—Information and Notices

Series L—Legislation

Series S—Supplements

Mutual Information System on Social protection in the Community (annual)

Public Health in Europe

Myalgic Encephalomyelitis

Mr. Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provisions there are for specific training for GPs (a) before and (b) post qualification for the diagnosis and treatment of ME. [33711]

Ms Jowell: There are currently no provisions for specific training for general practitioners before or post qualification for the diagnosis and treatment of myalgic encephalomyelitis (ME).

It is not practicable or desirable for the Government to prescribe the exact training that any individual doctor will receive. In general practice each trainee general practitioner will, during their year of general practice training, regularly see patients who present with those illnesses which are most common, which may well include patients with chronic fatigue syndrome/ME. This is in addition to the training received in medical school and during the pre-registration year and during their two-year hospital rotation.

Additionally, doctors are encouraged to continue with their medical education after qualification and it is expected that they will spend some of this time learning about the illnesses they most commonly encounter.

Asylum Seekers

Sir Raymond Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many asylum seekers have been transferred from London authorities to Wales in the last 12 months; and if he will ensure that Welsh local authorities are not required to contribute to their support. [33698]

Mr. Boateng: We are not aware of any asylum seekers being transferred by a local authority from London to Wales. If an authority makes arrangements under the National Assistance Act 1948 or the Children Act 1989 to place someone outside its boundaries, the financial responsibility remains with the placing authority.

GP Lists

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the number of patients struck off GP lists in each of the last three years, for each health authority; and if he will make a statement. [34028]

Mr. Milburn: General practitioners' terms of service provide that a doctor may have a person removed from their list.

The number of patients struck off GP lists for the years 1993–94, 1994–95 and 1995–96, for each former family health services authority, is published in the General Medical Practitioner Census Additional Data Collection 1995–1996, copies of which are in the Library.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those parliamentary questions he has taken eight weeks or more to answer since 1 May 1997. [32710]

Ms Jowell: The Department has received over 3,400 Parliamentary Questions since 1 May 1997. 15 questions, or half of one per cent. of the total, were not answered within eight weeks.

Mobile Phones

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what discussions he or his Department have had with representatives of the mobile phone industry concerning the possible medical effects of the use of mobile phone handsets; [34152]

(2) what research he has commissioned into the possible medical effects of (a) telecommunication masts and (b) the use of mobile phone handsets. [34153]

Ms Jowell: The Department has had no discussions with the mobile phone industry about possible health effects associated with handsets. The National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB) provides advice to Government on the risks to human health from both ionising and non-ionising radiations. NRPB's view is that mobile phone handsets currently used in the United Kingdom comply with the recommended exposure restrictions.

At locations accessible to the public, the electromagnetic radiation emitted by mobile phone transmitters is below maximum exposure levels recommended by the NRPB, published in Documents of the NRPB, Vol 4, No 5, 1993, copies of which have been placed in the Library.

Wider concerns about the alleged health effects of long term use of mobile phones are currently being addressed by a range of research undertakings. The Department has commissioned three studies on biological effects of mobile phone microwave frequencies. The first is investigating the influence of radiation on learning ability and behaviour, the second is a laboratory study looking for biological responses of human cells in an electromagnetic radiation field and the third is a human volunteer study investigating possible effects of mobile phone usage on cognitive ability.

The Department is also currently supporting the following initiatives:

the review of possible health effects of electromagnetic fields, including microwave frequencies, being undertaken by the Advisory Group on Non-ionising Radiation to the NRPB; the World Health Organisation International Electromagnetic Fields Project which includes health effects of microwave frequencies.

In addition a European Commission Expert Group has recommended a programme of scientific research to address the subject of mobile telephony and human health.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Poor People

Mr. Pond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will carry out an assessment of the impact of her Department's current policies on the (a) income, (b) employment opportunities and (c) living standards, of the poorest 30 per cent. of the population. [23342]

Mr. Keith Bradley: Our society is more divided than it has been for generations, and our policies are aimed at addressing these inequalities. We aim to offer educational and employment opportunities for all. The best way of improving the living standards of most people at the bottom of the income distribution is to help them into work, and we are implementing a range of policies under the New Deal to achieve this aim. We have also established a Social Exclusion Unit to co-ordinate action across Government to find new and more integrated ways of tackling the worst problems.

We continually evaluate our policies using a variety of methods. In particular, the annual Government Statistical Service publication "Households Below Average Income" contains detailed data on the position of those at the lower end of the income distribution.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will list those parliamentary questions she has taken eight weeks or more to answer since 1 May 1997. [32716]

Mr. Denham: There have been two parliamentary questions which have taken more than 8 weeks to answer (not including recesses):

Hon. Member received from	Date of Order Paper	Date answered
Argyll and Bute	22 May 1997	29 July 1997

Benefit Claimants (Millennium Awards)

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if Millennium Award grants given to benefit claimants will affect the levels of benefit which they receive. [34121]

Mr. Keith Bradley: Guidance issued by the Millennium Commission to organisations wishing to take part in the Award scheme (known as Award Partners) makes it clear that they are expected to take account of the implications an award might have for individuals, including eligibility for benefits, and to set out how this will be addressed so that individuals receiving benefits are not penalised. Prospective Partners normally discuss their proposals with this Department, as the potential effect of an award in an individual case would depend on a number of factors. These include the type of benefit concerned, the purpose of the award, whether any cash payment was to be made to the individual and, if so, whether it was to be paid as a one-off grant or a regular series of payments.

National Insurance Fund

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if she will estimate the effect on the National Insurance Fund in (a) 1999–2000, (b) 2000–01 and (c) 2001–02 of (i) leaving unchanged the expenses loading for contracted out money purchase schemes and (ii) increasing the rebate for contracted out salary-related schemes from 4.6 per cent. to 4.79 per cent; [34097]

(2) if she will estimate the effect on the National Insurance Fund in (a) 1999–2000, (b) 2000–01 and (c) 2001–02 of her proposed amendments to rebates for approved personal pension schemes. [34096]

Mr. Denham: The information is set out in the tables.

Estimated amount of revenue forgone in respect of contracted out money purchase schemes (COMPS) for the tax years 1999–2000 to 2001–2002

Year	£ million
1999–2000	69
2000–01	142
2001–02	144

Note:
It is based on the assumption that the rebate remains unchanged, and that the number and type of schemes which attracted that rebate do not alter.

As the report by the Secretary of State for Social Security on Certain Contracting-out Terms (Command 3888) explains, there is evidence to show that a significant percentage of schemes which previously contracted-out on a salary-related basis are switching to contracting-out on a money purchase basis. Some are doing this to take advantage of the higher age-related rebates, and others for business reasons unconnected to the rebate. Irrespective of the reasons why schemes are switching to become COMPS, given that many will now be larger schemes, the expense margin contained within the rebate is inappropriate.

Both this Government, and the previous one, made it clear that action would be taken to prevent further losses from the National Insurance Fund if it became apparent that the nature of COMP provision was changing. It is impossible therefore to provide a reliable estimate of what the various changes and behavioural effects imply for the National Insurance Fund. But clearly there would be huge costs if all schemes switched to take advantage of the current higher average rebates for COMPS.

Additional estimated amount of revenue forgone from the national insurance fund should the rebate in respect of contracted out salary-related scheme be increased to 4.79 per cent.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Bicycle Parking

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what provision for bicycle parking has been made at Portcullis House. [34085]

Sir Sydney Chapman: Bicycle parking to serve Portcullis House is already available at the Norman Shaw North Building.

Smoking Room

Mr. Brake: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee if he will list expenditure on (a) refurbishment of and (b) furnishings for the smoking room for each of the last five years. [34086]

Sir Sydney Chapman: The expenditure on both refurbishment and furnishings for the smoking room over the last five years has been of such a minor nature that separate records are not available.

Former Members (Remuneration)

Mr. Keetch: To ask the President of the Council if she will list for an hon. Member elected in October 1974, who lost their seat in May 1997, (a) the salary and individual allowances received (i) in actual terms and (ii) at today's value, (b) the total pension granted and (c) the amount received as winding up allowance, and the purpose for which this allowance is granted. [34435]

Mrs. Ann Taylor: The answers to the questions are in relation to the sums claimable and not to the sums actually received which are never divulged in individual cases:

(a) (i) Salaries: £442,748

Office Costs Allowance (OCA): £450,160

Additional Costs Allowance: £162,363

(ii) cannot be obtained except at disproportionate expense.

(b) £19,334.88 pa.

(c) The Winding Up Allowance available as at 1 May 1997, for those Members who left the House of Commons—for whatever reason—amounted to £15,856 (being one third of the annual sum available of OCA at that time of £47,568). Outgoing Members may submit claims up to that maximum to meet the cost of any work on Parliamentary business undertaken on behalf of that Member after the General Election date.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Pleas

Mr. Baker: To ask the Attorney-General what percentage of cases prosecuted by the Crown Prosecution Service were begun with the defendant having indicated an intention to plead (a) guilty to the offence for which he or she was charged, (b) guilty to a lesser charge and (c) not guilty. [34482]

The Attorney-General: The Crown Prosecution Service holds no central records on plea indications. The information is held in branch offices on individual case files, and could be obtained only at a disproportionate cost.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Attorney-General how many defendants were convicted having (a) pleaded guilty to the offence with which they were originally charged, (b) pleaded guilty to a lesser charge and (c) pleaded not guilty in the last year for which figures are available. [34478]

The Attorney-General: The Crown Prosecution Service holds no central records on pleas to original or lesser charges. The information is held on individual case files in each branch office, and could be obtained only at a disproportionate cost. However, central records are kept in relation to the number of defendants convicted following a not guilty plea.

The number of defendants convicted in magistrates' courts following a plea of not guilty was 53,235 in 1997, 74.4 per cent. of contested hearings.

The number convicted in the Crown Court following a plea of not guilty was 13,226, 60.3 per cent. of contested hearings.

Child Prostitution

Helen Jones: To ask the Attorney-General what was the cost of gaining convictions against children for offences relating to prostitution in each year since 1992. [34361]

The Attorney-General: The information sought is recorded only on individual case files and is not collected or collated centrally. This information could therefore be collected only at disproportionate cost. Home Office statistics for 1989 and 1994 show a decline in convictions for soliciting in the 14 to 17 year old age group.

WALES

National Assembly

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about the location of the National Assembly for Wales. [34734]

Mr. Ron Davies: I have decided to provide accommodation for the Assembly through a new building in Cardiff. My officials are in negotiation with developers, and I will announce the precise location when those negotiations are complete.

EU Agriculture Council

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he next plans to attend a meeting of the Council of Ministers of the European Union in relation to agriculture. [34277]

Mr. Win Griffiths: As the Minister responsible for agriculture in Wales, I will be attending the Agriculture Council meeting on 31 March.

Marine Pollution

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he has taken to improve the marine environment of the Irish Sea as it affects the Welsh coast line. [33528]

Mr. Win Griffiths: Levels of pollution in the Irish Sea are being investigated in a Quality Status Report being prepared under the auspices of the Oslo and Paris Commissions. A Regional Task Force is overseeing the Report's preparation: its membership is made up of experts from the Irish and UK Governments, including from the Welsh Office.

At the same time, action is in hand to tackle many of the sources of marine pollution. We are currently reviewing the National Contingency Plan for pollution from shipping and offshore installations which sets out the arrangements for dealing with pollution arising from spillages of oil and other hazardous substances into the marine environment. Whilst radioactive discharges into the Irish Sea are already at levels which cause minimal harm to the environment, we are reducing them still further. We have also said that we want to move toward the target of the cessation of discharges, emissions and losses of hazardous substances. The dumping of sewage sludge at sea is being phased out—Dwr Cymru Welsh Water stopped using this disposal route several years ago. Dwr Cymru is also introducing full treatment at all its coastal sewage discharges.

Social Exclusion

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the social exclusion network as it affects (a) North and (b) South Wales. [33531]

Mr. Win Griffiths: The Welsh Office Social Exclusion Network is an internal Welsh Office group consisting of senior officials drawn from across the spectrum of the Department's functions. Its remit is to promote effective co-operation between the various parts of the Welsh Office to tackle social exclusion and to shift the focus of policies and programmes towards preventing social exclusion across Wales. Its work builds on and complements that of the Social Exclusion Unit, which is based within the Cabinet Office.

Timber-processing Industry

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the number of jobs in the timber processing industry in Wales. [33529]

Mr. Hain: The Office for National Statistics' 1995 Annual Employment Survey estimated that there were 3,900 employees in the timber processing industry in Wales.

School Leavers

Sir Raymond Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many 18 and 19 year olds left school in Wales with no qualifications in each year since 1992. [33703]

Mr. Hain: Information on the qualifications on school leavers is not held by age group prior to 1994. From 1994, the collected information has distinguished as a single group all those aged 17 and over as at 31 August of the preceding academic year. This will include some pupils who leave school aged 17 and a few who left school aged over 19. The following table shows the number of such students who left school with no A-level, AS-level, GCSE, Certificate of Education or vocational qualification from BTEC, Pitmans, City & Guilds or RSA.

Number of people aged 17 and over leaving school with no qualifications[1]

1993–94	60
1994–95	55

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Buses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many bus companies have been banned from operating buses in the last 12 months for which figures are available due to concerns about the condition of the vehicles. [33365]

Ms Glenda Jackson: In the period 1 March 1997 to 28 February 1998 twenty bus companies have had their licence revoked by the Traffic Commissioners due to inadequate maintenance of their vehicles. The companies concerned are as follows:

Western Traffic Area
- Valley Travel, Bristol

Scottish Traffic Area
- St Andrews Coaches, Fife
- Grahams of Gretna
- White Ribbon Coaches
- Govan Minibuses

North Eastern & North Western Traffic Area
- Valley Coaches
- Ted's Auto Minibuses
- Richard Smith
- Diane's Coaches
- Browns of Durham

Eastern Traffic Area
- G & J Minibus Service
- Paul Steed Coaches
- West End Travel & Car Hire Services

West Midland & South Wales Traffic Area
- Colwill Coaches
- Phillips Coaches
- Dixieland Eurogold
- Black Horse Coaches

South Eastern & Metropolitan Traffic Area
- Red & Green Coaches
- South Coast Coaches & Minibuses
- Westerham Coaches Ltd.

Coastguard

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if it is the policy of Her Majesty's Government to maintain the current coastguard helicopter search and rescue provision at Lee-on-Solent and Portland. [33378]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Coastguard helicopters at Lee-on-Solent and Portland are contracted until 2001. The Coastguard Agency has no plans to change the current arrangements.

Bus Services

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many individual journeys provided by bus operators in the north west traffic area were cancelled without notice during (i) 1994–95, (ii) 1995–96 and (iii) 1996–97; and what percentage of total journeys these figures represent. [33959]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My Department does not collect this information in the form requested. However, under the provisions of the Transport Act 1985 bus operators are required to run services in accordance with the details they register with the local Traffic Commissioner, whose staff monitor compliance on a random basis. Details are not available for 1994–95 and 1995–96 but the results of 22 monitoring exercises carried out in the north west traffic area in 1996–97 and 54 in 1997–98 to date, show that the number of individual journeys which failed to run was a negligible proportion, less than 3 per cent. of total bus journeys in the area. In view of local concerns, the traffic area office are planning further monitoring exercises in the area including Greater Manchester.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the inquiry into the derailment of a train carrying nuclear waste at Harwich on 8 January; and when its report will be published. [33906]

Ms Glenda Jackson: This incident occurred at approximately 17.50 hours on 8 January 1998, at Harwich Parkstone Quay Yard. During shunting operations one pair of wheels of a barrier wagon, between a locomotive and three nuclear flask wagons, became derailed on hand worked points. The barrier wagon contained no nuclear materials and there were no injuries.

The incident was investigated by the Health and Safety Executive's Railway Inspectorate and a summary of the incident will appear in the 1997–98 Annual Report on Railway Safety which is due for publication in December 1998.

Aviation Industry

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he (a) has made and (b) plans to make to the IPCC study into the Impacts of Aviation on Climate Change; and what consultations the Government have had, for the purpose of this study, with organisations outside the aviation industry. [34112]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The DETR plays a leading part in the International Civil Aviation Organisation which is working closely with the IPCC on this special report. One of the report's two lead authors is an adviser to the Department and the DETR is also supporting the participation of other key UK experts.

The IPCC process is an open one and the draft report will be available for review by experts, governments and international non-governmental organisations.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what reasons the aviation industry has given his Department for its opposition to new noise limits for departing aircraft at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted. [34114]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The grounds put forward by the International Air Transport Association in their recent application for leave to apply for judicial review related to alleged deficiencies in the consultation paper. The Department has undertaken to publish a supplementary paper and IATA has therefore withdrawn its application. I expect those airlines and aviation organisations which are opposed to our proposals will give their reasons for this in their responses to the consultation.

Trams

Ms Shipley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what measures he proposes to encourage the development of trams. [34491]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Light rapid transit systems, which include street running tramways, can have a role to play in delivering integrated transport in urban areas—particularly if they are planned as part of an overall local transport strategy. We look to local authorities to develop proposals through public/private partnerships and will consider on their merits any such proposals which require support from Government funds.

Park-and-ride Schemes

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the number of park-and-ride schemes for which each local authority bid for funding under the transport policy and programmes system for 1998–99, indicating in each case the amount of money bid for; and if he will list by local authority, the number of schemes which received funding under the transport policy and programmes system for 1998–99, indicating in each case the amount of money allocated. [34522]

Ms Glenda Jackson: All the available information is contained in the table. Only park-and-ride schemes that individually cost £2 million or more received scheme-specific allocations for 1998–99. Local authorities also have the freedom to pursue schemes below that value, using the block allocations they receive for packages of transport measures. Under the package approach they are not required to specify before the start of a financial year the schemes they will pursue using those allocations. So except for the single major scheme shown, the figures in the right hand column of the table indicate only the schemes that authorities could pursue if they wished.

Local Authority Pensions

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans his Department has to change the basis of actuarial assumption in the valuation of local authority pension funds. [34359]

Mr. Raynsford: My Department has no responsibility under the regulations governing the Local Government Pension Scheme to set actuarial assumptions in connection with the valuation of local authority pension funds. This is a matter for fund actuaries in the context of the triennial valuation exercise for each fund.

Vehicle Excise Duty

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on how many heavy goods vehicles vehicle excise duty was paid in Northern Ireland in each of the years (a) 1994–95, (b) 1995–96 and (c) 1996–97. [34465]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The information is available only in calendar years, as follows:

Surplus Property and Land

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the properties and land owned by his Department which he has identified as surplus to requirements, giving in each case their estimated value. [30317]

Mr. Tom Clarke [holding answer 23 February 1998]: No properties or land which are surplus to requirements at the present time are held by the main Department or the Historic Royal Palaces Agency. The Royal Parks Agency have one dwelling, valued at approx £90,000, which is surplus to requirements and which is being disposed of.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the bodies within the responsibility of his Department currently required by legislation to lay a report before Parliament. [33554]

PRIME MINISTER

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list those visits made within the United Kingdom since 1 May on which he has been accompanied under Rule 83 of the Ministerial Code indicating (i) those persons accompanying and (ii) the cost to public funds. [23756]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 19 January 1998]: My wife accompanied me on the following official visits within the United Kingdom since 1 May:

June: Redditch and Worcester

September: Scotland, Wales

October: Edinburgh.

We were accompanied by officials and protection officers.

There were no additional costs to public funds other than for two occasions when the total cost was less than £100 in both cases.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the Ministers, officials and others who accompanied him on his visit to Washington on 4 to 7 February, indicating the reasons why each attended, the itinerary of each and their travel and other expenses. [28188]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 6 February 1998]: I was accompanied by nine key officials from the No. 10 Private and Press Offices and the Policy Unit and two outside experts. There was also the normal number of security and secure telecommunications staff who accompany a Prime Minister on an overseas visit. The three Ministers on the trip were each accompanied by an official.

Because of the block booking arrangements, the cost per person for travel was £3,500.

The accommodation costs for all the members of the official delegation were fully met by the United States government. Costs for support staff were £400 per person. The two outside experts met all their own costs.

These arrangements are in line with overseas visits made by the previous Administration.

The full cost of Ministerial overseas visits for 1996–97 was over £7.8 million. This compares with expenditure since 1 May of less than £5 million.

Israel

Mr. Faber: To ask the Prime Minister what representations he made to Prime Minister Netanyahu during their recent meeting concerning (a) Israeli commitments to honour existing agreements, (b) further Israeli redeployments, (c) Israeli expansion of settlements, (d) the opening of Gaza airport and (e) the resumption of final status talks. [34151]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 12 March 1998]: I met Prime Minster Netanyahu on 9 March. I underlined the need for both parties to respect their commitments under existing agreements. I emphasised the need for progress on implementation of Interim Agreement commitments, particularly on further redeployments from the West Bank, security co-operation, Gaza port, airport and industrial estate and safe passage. I also set out the government's view that progress on these issues and avoidance of unilateral actions which destroy confidence are essential to restore trust and allow for a resumption of negotiations on final status issues.

News International

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 5 March 1998, Official Report, column 702, for what reason it is not his policy to give specific details of meetings between himself or his officials and (a) Rupert Murdoch and (b) representatives of News International. [34521]

The Prime Minister: As under previous administrations, it is not the normal practice to provide details of private meetings with specific individuals or organisations.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Knives

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to review legislation on knives; and if he will assess the advantage of banning knives with sharp points except when such knives are designated as for a specific and legitimate purpose. [33105]

Mr. Michael: The need for legislation to control the availability and promotion of knives as weapons was considered in detail by hon. Members during 1996 and 1997 during the passage of the Offensive Weapons Act 1996 and the Knives Act 1997, introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Baillieston (Mr. Wray) which was fully supported by my right hon. Friend and myself, then in Opposition. We had concluded that simply banning knives with sharp points except when such knives are designated for a specific and legitimate purpose would not achieve the desired end. Knives with legitimate purposes can be as lethal as ones which would not be so designated and such an approach would require a complex and costly designation system.

While the Government have no plans at present for a further review, we remain open to any suggestions for a further tightening of legislation on knives, and would consider banning the sale of any specific bladed or pointed article which could be defined in a way which distinguished it from articles which do have legitimate purposes.

Police Evidence

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions in respect of the evidence of how many Metropolitan police officers the prosecution has been required to disclose that evidence given by that officer had previously been discredited. [34273]

Mr. Michael: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that no central figures are kept on the number of cases where the prosecution has had to disclose that the evidence of an officer has on a previous occasion been discredited. Nevertheless, the Commissioner demands absolute integrity from his officers. If an officer gives evidence which raises concern with the trial magistrate or judge then they will direct that the matter be investigated. The procedure is for an internal investigation to be started. If, following such an investigation, the officer can be shown to be discredited then any cases in which the officer is subsequently involved would be reviewed by the Metropolitan Police and the Crown Prosecution Service.

Prisons (Drugs)

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what evaluation he has made of technology to detect the presence of (a) class A and (b) class B drugs on persons entering prisons. [34467]

Mr. George Howarth: The Prison Service Security Group, through the Police Scientific Development Branch, are currently evaluating a number of drug detecting systems in laboratory tests and will be implementing field trials within prison establishments shortly. The evaluation will cover the detection of both class A and class B drugs.

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures he is undertaking to prevent the entry of class A and B drugs to prisons. [34466]

Mr. George Howarth: The Prison Service has in place as part of its drug strategy robust measures aimed at preventing the entry of drugs into prisons. In practical terms, the methods aimed at preventing the entry of drugs are the same for all classes of drugs. All drugs are hard to detect due to the small amounts usually involved, although the additional risks posed by class A drugs are recognised.

Measures include: searching of visitors and of prisoners following visits; use of closed circuit television in visits areas; and perimeter searching. Many establishments use drug dogs which are an effective means of deterring visitors who may attempt to smuggle drugs. Prisoners found guilty of drug smuggling are liable to be placed on closed visits, while visitors may be arrested and denied future visits if found with drugs.

Fruit Machines

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will delay the triennial review of jackpot sizes for fruit machines. [34423]

Mr. George Howarth: We expect the Gaming Board to make its recommendations to us in June with a view to implementation of any agreed changes with effect from 1 October.

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the report by Dr. Fisher of Plymouth University on jackpot prizes. [34422]

Mr. George Howarth: Dr. Fisher's report for OFLOT was on gambling and problem gambling among young people. The Government will carefully consider the report's findings, including those on fruit machines, and any implications for gambling controls.

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the effect of the introduction of the £2 coin on fruit machine revenues. [34429]

Mr. George Howarth: None.

Football-related Offences

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the range of penalties available to courts in respect of those subject to restriction orders as a result of offences related to football matches who failed to attend designated police stations. [34274]

Mr. Michael: Section 16 of the Football Spectators Act 1989 sets out the effect of a restriction order and provides for the offence of failure to comply with the duty to report. A person who fails to report to a police station without reasonable excuse is liable on conviction to a term of imprisonment of up to one month or a level 3 fine (currently £1,000) or both.

World Cup

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will liaise with the French authorities to ensure that tickets for the World Cup are not re-sold. [34285]

Mr. Michael: France has strict laws against ticket touting under their Penal Code. All tickets for the World Cup will carry the name of the person to whom they are issued by the French authorities. The tickets can be re-sold only with the written permission of the authorities, and without that authority the original purchaser remains liable for the actions of those in the ground who use the ticket. The French authorities have advised they will rigidly apply the law against those who are in breach of the Code. My right hon. Friend has welcomed this approach in meetings with his French counterpart. Additionally, United Kingdom officials have discussed with the French authorities the practical measures in place to minimise the ability to sell tickets without written permission from the relevant authorities. We have registered our concern at the potential impact on safety and security of touted tickets getting into the hands of rival fans.

Correspondence

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will reply to the letter of 20 November 1997 from the hon. Member for Spelthorne concerning Mrs. H. Buckell of Staines. [34281]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Home Office has no trace of ever having received the letter. Having now received a copy of it from the hon. Member, I will reply to him as soon as possible.

Police Vehicles (Heathrow)

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many vehicles designed for transporting people are operated by the Heathrow Airport Division of the Metropolitan Police. [34284]

Mr. Michael: The Commissioner tells me that Heathrow Division has 52 vehicles of which 45 are designed for transporting people. These include motorcycles, response vehicles, beat vehicles and armoured Landrovers.

Prisoners (Repatriation)

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how release dates of prisoners who are repatriated from abroad are calculated. [34935]

Mr. Straw: The release dates of repatriated prisoners are calculated on the basis of the legislation in force on the date on which the prisoner is repatriated, subject to the provisions of the Schedule to the Repatriation of Prisoners Act 1984 (as amended by Schedule 2 to the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997).

The warrants under which prisoners are repatriated may contain reference to two separate periods. The first is the balance to serve, which is deemed to be the prisoner's sentence in this country. The second, for prisoners for whom it is applicable, is a period used solely to calculate the parole eligibility date of the prisoner.

In calculating the balance of the sentence remaining to be served by a prisoner following return to this country, account is taken of the time served abroad by the prisoner including, where applicable, any remand time and any remission available to the prisoner. The resulting balance is administered in accordance with the relevant United Kingdom legislative provisions. Automatic release in the case of prisoners sentenced abroad to four years or more therefore occurs at the two thirds point of the balance to serve, and for prisoners sentenced abroad to less than four years, at the halfway point. Prisoners sentenced to periods of imprisonment abroad of four years or more are also eligible to be considered for discretionary release on licence (parole).

As far as parole is concerned, it has always been the policy that a repatriated prisoner should be treated as if he had been sentenced here i.e. he should become eligible for parole after having served one half of his original term of imprisonment (or one third in the case of prisoners sentenced prior to 1 October 1992). For the purposes of achieving this, it was the practice to specify in the warrant for the purposes solely of calculating parole eligibility, a period equivalent to the time actually served by the prisoner abroad.

Amendments made to the 1984 Act as a consequence of the introduction of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 resulted in anomalies with regard to the position of repatriated prisoners. In particular, the amendments linked parole eligibility and automatic release dates. As a consequence specifying a period in the warrant for the purposes of calculating parole eligibility had the unintended effect of bringing forward the prisoner's automatic release date. Judicial reviews brought in 1995 and 1996 brought these difficulties to light for the first time. It also emerged that the parole eligibility dates of prisoners had not previously been calculated fully in accordance with the terms of the legislation.

The difficulties identified in the legislation were corrected by means of amendments to the 1984 Act contained in Schedule 2 of the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997. In the light of the amendments and the discovery that parole dates were not previously calculated entirely in accordance with the legislation, it has become clear that it is not always appropriate to specify in the warrant a period equivalent to the actual time served by the prisoner abroad since this does not always result in the correct parole eligibility date.

Since 1 October 1997, therefore, normal policy has been to specify, for the purposes of calculating parole eligibility in accordance with the provisions of the Schedule to the 1984 Act, a period which ensures that the prisoner becomes eligible to be considered for parole after having served one half (or one third) of the original sentence. Each case is considered on an individual basis, taking into account the length of the original sentence, the time served abroad, and the balance to serve in this country.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Plutonium

Mr. Baker: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps she takes to ensure plutonium held for civil purposes cannot fall into the hands of people whose possession of such would constitute a threat to national security. [34471]

Mr. Battle: The stringent physical protection measures in place for the protection of civil plutonium follow the relevant international recommendations published by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA). These measures are kept under review to ensure their continuing effectiveness. For security reasons, I cannot give the details of the precise measures which are taken.

Civil plutonium at UK nuclear facilities are subject to Euratom safeguards and to the terms of the UK Safeguards Agreement with Euratom and the IAEA.

Mr. Baker: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimate she has made of the costs of providing security to protect the stocks of plutonium held for civil purposes for the latest year for which figures are available. [34470]

Mr. Battle: Security costs for nuclear facilities are funded by the operator responsible for the relevant facility. They would include both the installation and maintenance costs of a range of physical protection measures, the guarding costs and the costs of the independent regulation of that security envelope. It is not possible to provide separate estimates of the costs of protecting the United Kingdom's stocks of civil plutonium.

Mr. Baker: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much plutonium has been (a) exported from the UK and (b) imported into the UK for each year since 1979 indicating the countries of origin and destination for each movement. [34485]

Mr. Battle: Details of the quantities of civil plutonium exported from, and imported to, the United Kingdom, including countries of origin and destination, are published by my Department each year. Copies of all the annual plutonium figures since 1987 have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. Figures relating to exports and imports before 1987 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Baker: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much civil plutonium has been held in the United Kingdom in each year since 1979. [34475]

Mr. Battle: Details of the quantities of civil plutonium stored at United Kingdom nuclear facilities, including its form and ownership, are published by my Department each year. Copies of all the annual plutonium figures since 1987 have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. Figures relating to holdings before 1987 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Baker: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much civil plutonium has been (a) produced in the United Kingdom and (b) used in the United Kingdom in each year since 1979. [34473]

Mr. Battle: Details of the quantities of civil plutonium produced and used at United Kingdom nuclear facilities are published by my Department each year. Copies of all the annual plutonium figures since 1987 have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. Figures relating to civil plutonium produced and used before 1987 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Millennium Compliance

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the estimate of £2,700,000 for achieving millennium compliance at her Department has been revised. [32370]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 3 March 1998]: No. The estimate remains unchanged from that made under the previous Government. We will of course keep this under constant scrutiny.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the code checking exercise for millennium compliance at the Radiocommunications Agency's will be completed. [32373]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 3 March 1998]: Code checking of the Radiocommunications Agency's 'business critical' bespoke software systems is planned to be complete in January 1999. All other bespoke software code checking is expected to finish by the end of May 1999.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the testing of systems for millennium compliance at the Export Credits Guarantee Department will be completed. [32375]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 3 March 1998]: The bulk of the systems will be tested by 31 March 1998. However, we are awaiting upgraded software from two package suppliers and thus the testing will not be completed until these are available later in 1998.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the estimate of £184,187 for achieving millennium compliance at the Export Credits Guarantee Department has been revised. [32376]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 3 March 1998]: No.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if her estimate of £7,200 for the cost of achieving millennium compliance in the Insolvency Service has been exceeded. [32363]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 3 March 1998]: The estimate of £7,200 was provided by the Insolvency Service in its response to a request for year 2000 plans to be provided to the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency (CCTA) and represented the cost of remaining compliance testing for the Service's IT systems. This testing will not be completed until mid 1998 and current indications are that the original estimate will not be exceeded.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade to what extent her estimate for the costs of achieving millennium compliance in the Employment Tribunals Service has been revised, following the systems audit. [32366]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 3 March 1998]: The cost of system audits is £72,850 inclusive of VAT.

The estimated cost of purchasing new compliant software is £116,860 inclusive of VAT.

An estimate is awaited from third party suppliers on the costs of remedial work on other software.

The cost of remedial work on embedded systems will be finalised following the results of the audit due by the end of March 1998.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the audit of the Employment Tribunals Service for millennium compliance will be completed. [32364]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 3 March 1998]: The audit is expected to be completed on schedule by the end of March 1998.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the Patent Office has completed contacting all suppliers about millennium compliance. [32371]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 3 March 1998]: The Patent Office is undertaking an extensive programme of checks to ensure that its effective operation is not prejudiced by the millennium date change. As part of this programme it has already been in touch with its existing suppliers of goods and services and will seek assurances on compliance from any new supplier with which it places a contract.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when all testing on Year 2000 compliance will be completed within the Department. [32353]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 3 March 1998]: The core DTI plans to complete Year 2000 compliance testing by the end of April 1999.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the estimate of £850,000 for achieving millennium compliance within the Patent Office has been revised. [32372]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 3 March 1998]: The Patent Office revisited this estimate in February as part of the quarterly monitoring of compliance programmes carried out by the CCTA but found no reason for change.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when (a) the conversion and (b) the testing of systems in Companies House for achieving millennium compliance will be completed. [32367]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 3 March 1998]: Conversion should still be completed by October 1998 with final testing anticipated over the Easter weekend, 1999.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade from which budgetary sub-head will the costs of millennium compliance be met by her Department. [32356]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 3 March 1998]: The cost of millennium compliance work on core DTI systems will be met from several budgetary sub-heads. Outsourced technical advice and support budgets for IT and premises will meet part of the cost. Where systems are being replaced or enhanced significantly for various reasons including millennium compliance, the Department's central IT capital budget is being employed. The cost of work done by officials to manage the programme falls on the relevant budgets such as salaries and accommodation.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the estimate of £317,000 for achieving millennium compliance in the systems at Companies House has been revised. [32368]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 3 March 1998]: No, it remains our current estimate.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the assessment of the main systems at her Department for millennium compliance will be completed. [32369]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 3 March 1998]: Assessment of business critical IT systems within the core DTI is complete and necessary remedial work has started.

Officials plan to complete their assessment of building-related systems by the end of March 1998.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the estimate of £1,000,000 for achieving millennium compliance at the Radiocommunications Agency has been revised. [32374]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 3 March 1998]: The Radiocommunication Agency's initial estimate for its Year 2000 programme was £1.08 million; latest estimates indicate an expected cost of £1.04 million.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will estimate the cost to her Department of (a) consultants and (b) contractors engaged by the Department to address millennium computer compliance problems; and if she will list them. [32489]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 3 March 1998]: The costs of addressing the millennium compliance of core DTI computer systems are estimated as follows:

(a) Consultants: £1.6 million

(b) Contractors: £1.1 million.

Consultants and contractors have worked for the Department on a number of millennium computer compliance assignments. Numbers and personnel vary according to the needs of these assignments. At present the following consultants and contractors are engaged on this work in the core Department:

(a) 7 Consultants, supplied by Cap Gemini (3) and CMG (4)

(b) 15 Contractors, supplied by CAP Gemini (10) and ICL (5).

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many people working within the Department on millennium compliance have (a) given notice of their intention to leave and (b) left the Department in the last six months. [32352]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 3 March 1998]: No civil servants primarily engaged within the Department on millennium compliance work have given notice of their intention to leave or have left the Department in the last six months.

In that period one consultant completed an IT millennium compliance assignment and left the Department. Another moved to other duties within his company and has been replaced by a colleague. Two more have very recently given notice of resignation from their respective companies and will be replaced.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the remedial work on millennium compliance at the Insolvency Service will be completed. [32362]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 3 March 1998]: The Insolvency Service anticipates confirming millennium compliance by the end of October 1998.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much her Department will spend on achieving millennium compliance for its own computer systems between the present time and 1 January 2000. [32687]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 3 March 1998]: My department plans to spend approximately £1.93 million on achieving compliance for its core computer systems between the present time and 1 January 2000.

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action the OECD has taken to promulgate the need for computer systems to be millennium compliant. [33861]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I have been asked to reply.

We are actively considering with the OECD what work they could undertake to raise awareness on the Millennium bug.

Employment Tribunals Service

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the testing of all systems within the Employment Tribunals Service will be completed. [32365]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 3 March 1998]: The ETS aims to complete testing by the end of 1998.

Council for Science and Technology

Mr. Goggins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans she has for the Council for Science and Technology. [34934]

Mrs. Beckett: On behalf of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, I am pleased to announce today that, following extensive consultations and review, we are re-establishing the Council for Science and Technology with new terms of reference and the appointment of 14 independent members to serve as our premier advisory body on science and technology. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

I am delighted that we will be able to call on such a highly talented, experienced and distinguished people for independent, high level advice and very much look forward to working with them and with Sir Robert May as my Deputy.

Vehicle Emissions

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment her clean car task force has made of the research into wet collectors and coalescent filters conducted by Ford and PCME. [33112]

Mr. Battle: The Cleaner Vehicles Task Force, of which Ian McAllister of Ford is a co-chair, will be exploring a wide range of issues affecting the development, purchasing and use of cleaner vehicles. An element of major importance will be the contribution of new technologies to environmental objectives.

At this early stage, no assessment of any individual technological solutions has been made. However, under the Foresight Vehicle LINK Programme, the Government are providing over £5 million for collaborative research between industry and the science-base, to accelerate the exploitation of a range of environmentally friendly automotive technologies.

Measles, Mumps and Rubella Vaccine

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the possible link between the MMR vaccine and the development of autism. [33921]

Ms Jowell: Following recent media coverage of a paper published in The Lancet on 28 February, the Chief Medical Officer, Sir Kenneth Calman, issued a public statement on 12 March as follows:

"Since the Lancet article was published there has been much misleading media coverage about possible links between measles, mumps and rubella (MMR) and autism. I am concerned that health professionals should have available the best information to give to parents.

Despite the Lancet paper stating categorically 'We did not prove a link between MMR vaccine and the syndrome described', this work has been wrongly reported as demonstrating a real causal association.

Independent experts and I have seen the published research and we are not convinced that there is indeed any link. No evidence has been published that demonstrates that MMR plays a part in autism.

Only one of the 13 authors of the Lancet paper has suggested, although not via published papers, that MMR should be given as three separate injections at least a year apart. The following points are important for parents and health professionals alike:

There is no published evidence to support the separate doses suggestion. The suggestion is counter to the recommendations of the Department of Health's independent experts and the World Health Organisation.

There are clear adverse consequences from following such a suggestion: take up for three separate immunisations will undoubtedly be less than that where only one is needed—some children will inevitably miss one or two jabs.

During the period from the first to the third injections children will be left unnecessarily at risk from serious diseases whilst they wait, unprotected, for two years or more between vaccines. During this time they and their contacts are at risk of infection.

Concerned parents, may find it helpful to know that the Assistant Director-General of the World Health Organisation, Dr. Ralph Henderson, has written to the Department of Health this week saying:

'We believe none of these data [in the Lancet article] provide a basis for providing the different components of this vaccine in separate schedules.

We wished to inform you of this as a means of offering you and your colleagues support in remaining firm in supporting the continued use of this highly effective vaccine which has such an outstanding safety record.'

Immunisation policy is built on scientific evidence of benefit and risk. No scientific evidence of the risk of autism from MMR has been published. There is an inevitable increased risk in following the suggestion that children receive three separate vaccines, given that they may then be exposed to serious infections for far longer than necessary. Therefore I strongly recommend that parents continue to have their children vaccinated with MMR."

The Chief Medical Officer's statement also included the following joint statement by the British Medical Association, Community Practitioners' and Health Visitors' Association, Faculty of Public Health Medicine, General Medical Services Committee, Royal College of General Practitioners, Royal College of Midwives, Royal College of Nursing, Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health, and Royal College of Physicians:

"We fully support the Chief Medical Officer's advice. We strongly advise all parents to continue with the present MMR vaccination programme. This is essential for the welfare of children."

The Chief Medical Officer's statement concluded:

"I believe it is important to listen to all the arguments on this topic. Last year I agreed to convene a scientific seminar to air these issues. That independent seminar is now being organised by the Medical Research Council and will bring together experts on virology, epidemiology, gastroenterology, paediatrics and immunology. Following that meeting, on the 23 March, I will be writing to all doctors to let them know my conclusions."

Renal Services

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the provision of funding for renal services at (a) Preston and (b) Chorley and South Ribble Hospital. [33952]

Mr. Milburn: The South Lancashire Health Authority contract for renal services with the Royal Preston Hospital for 1997–98 is for £640,000. No renal services are provided at Chorley and South Ribble hospital, with the exception of outreach nephrology outpatient clinics at the hospital, paid for through the Preston contract.

Kidney Disease (Deaths)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representation he has received on the incidence of deaths from kidney disease in the Chorley and South Ribble area. [33951]

Mr. Milburn: We have not received any representations on the incidence of and deaths from kidney disease in the Chorley and South Ribble area.

Cannabis

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he has had with the BMA concerning its recent report on the therapeutic uses of cannabis; and if he will make a statement. [34459]

Mr. Boateng: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has not had any discussions with the British Medical Association (BMA) on the therapeutic use of cannabis. However, the Chief Medical Officer and Departmental officials met the BMA on 10 March to discuss their report on the therapeutic uses of cannabis.

Health Services (Oxfordshire)

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total number of trusts in Oxfordshire; what is the average population served by each trust; what is the average national figure for all health authorities; and what is the Government's target figure for population coverage by health trusts. [34430]

Mr. Milburn: The figures are set out in the table:

	Oxfordshire	England
Population (1996 estimates)	603,200	49,089,100
Number of National Health Service trusts	8	425
Population per NHS trust	75,400	115,500

There is no target for population cover by NHS trusts.

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients are currently on waiting lists in Oxfordshire; and how this compares to figures over the last two years. [34441]

Mr. Milburn: Information on the number of residents of Oxfordshire Health Authority waiting on ordinary and day case waiting lists on 31 December 1997 and for the preceding two years is given in the table.

Health authority (resident based) number waiting

	Ordinary admissions	Day case admissions
At 31 December 1995	6,188	4,023
At 31 December 1996	6,371	4,246
At 31 December 1997	6,883	5,989

[1] Provisional figures

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on resourcing of community health trusts in Oxfordshire per head of population relative to other health authorities. [34450]

Mr. Milburn: Different patterns of service provision in different parts of the country make such direct comparisons impossible.

Community Hospitals

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the statutory requirements for consultation when closing a community hospital. [34438]

Mr. Milburn: The National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990 requires that consultation must take place on the dissolution of NHS trusts. Additionally, the Community Health Councils (CHCs) Regulations 1996 require health authorities to consult CHCs on any proposals which the health authority has under consideration for any substantial developments of the health service in the CHCs' district and any substantial variation in the provision of such services.

Poverty

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the level of poverty in (a) real and (b) relative terms in (i) 1979 and (ii) the most recent year for which data are available, giving the numbers and proportions of children above these levels. [28826]

Mr. Keith Bradley: I have been asked to reply.

There are various indicators which can be used to determine the scale of the situation which needs to be addressed in reforming welfare.

The tables shows the information required according to two indicators which can be used—people whose income is above half the average income, and numbers above the bottom quintile of the income distribution.

Numbers (in millions) of people and children, and the proportion of children, living in households with (a) income above half contemporary average income in 1979 and (b) above the 1979 half average in 1994–95, and (c) income above half contemporary average income in 1994–95. In each case figures are shown before housing costs (BHC) and after housing costs (AHC).

Year	Number of people		Number of children		Proportion of children
	BHC	AHC	BHC	AHC	BHC (per cent.)	AHC (per cent.)
(a) 1979	49.6	49.0	12.6	12.4	91	90
(b) 1994–95 above 1979 average	54.6	52.3	12.4	11.6	93	87
(c) 1994–95 above 1994–95 average	47.2	44.1	10.0	9.1	75	68

Numbers (in millions) of people and children, and the proportion of children, living in households with income above the bottom quintile of the income distribution in (a) 1979 and (b) 1994–95, before housing costs (BHC) and after housing costs (AHC).

Year	Number of people		Number of children		Proportion of children
	BHC	AHC	BHC	AHC	BHC (per cent.)	AHC (per cent.)
(a) 1979	43.2	43.2	10.9	10.9	79	79
(b) 1994–95	46.0	46.0	9.7	9.5	73	71

Notes:
1. All figures include the self-employed.
2. Figures for proportion of children use a child population of 13.8 million in 1979 and 13.3 million in 1994–95.
3. Figures use total population figures of 54 million in 1979 and 57.5 million in 1994–95.

[33058]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 9 March 1998]: Information for each of the last five years could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

I regret that the information for each of the last five years could only be provided at disproportionate cost. However, in calendar year 1997 there were 24 new entrants into PSD, none of whom went to Oxford or Cambridge University.

Dietary Supplements

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many of the papers relating to vitamin B6 which were considered by the Committee on Toxicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment he has evaluated; and on what dates he read each paper. [33514]

Mr. Rooker: I have not evaluated any of the papers relating to vitamin B6 which were considered by the Committee on Toxicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment (COT), nor am I qualified to do so. However, since I announced the Government's decision to introduce controls on dietary supplements containing vitamin B6 I have read both the papers on the safety of vitamin B6 that were prepared for the COT by its Secretariat, together with a selection of the scientific studies to which these refer.

It is the COT's role to evaluate the scientific evidence on toxicity of chemicals in food and to advise the Government on such matters. The Government have every confidence in the rigour with which the COT reviewed the data on the safety of vitamin B6, and the decision to introduce controls on dietary supplements containing this vitamin was taken in the light of the very clear recommendations of the COT and the Food Advisory Committee.

Cattle Carcases

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) how many (a) carcases and (b) tonnes of meat and bonemeal of cattle slaughtered under the Over Thirty Months Scheme and the Selective Cull were disposed of in each quarter of 1997; and what is the present weekly rate of disposal; [34289]

(2) how many (a) carcases and (b) tonnes of meat and bonemeal of cattle slaughtered under the Over Thirty Months Scheme and the Selective Cull are in storage now; and what was the figure on 1 May 1997; [34291]

(3) what methods have been used for the disposal of (a) carcases and (b) meat and bonemeal since 1 May 1997; [34290]

(4) what are the current weekly costs of storing (a) the carcases and (b) the meat and bonemeal of cattle slaughtered under the Over Thirty Months Scheme and the Selective Cull. [34292]

Mr. Rooker: The animals purchased by the Intervention Board under the Over Thirty Months Scheme (OTMS) and the Selective Cull Scheme (SCS) are either being directly incinerated, or rendered into meat and bonemeal (MBM) and tallow which is being safely and securely stored pending destruction.

Some MBM is already being disposed of via high temperature waste incineration. Whilst the Board is negotiating with a number of companies for the large scale incineration of MBM with energy recovery, no decisions have yet been taken on any option or options. The goal remains to find a disposal solution which takes full account of the need to protect human and environmental health whilst at the same time keeping the cost to the taxpayer as low as is consistent with this. In the meantime the Board is pressing ahead with plans to increase the number of carcases which are directly incinerated, as indicated in my answer to the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) on 19 December 1997, Official Report, columns 374–75.

The number of animals slaughtered and disposed of under the OTMS and SCS, and quantity of MBM from these schemes which was incinerated in 1997, together with the present rate of disposal, is as follows:

1997 Disposal (by quarter)	January to March	April to June	July to September	October to December
			Incinerated
(a) Number of carcases
OTMS	17,658	18,983	17,216	21,793
SCS	4	187	289	733
(b) MBM (tonnes)
OTMS	1,026	1,676	1,831	2,008
			Rendered
(a) Number of carcases
OTMS	197,876	170,018	189,621	217,935
SCS	693	9,415	21,403	23,334
(b) MBM (tonnes)

Present disposal (by week)	Rendering	Incineration
Average weekly rates
OTMS Carcases	13,300	[1]2,400
OTMS MBM (tonnes)	0	350
SCS Carcases	750	70

[1] Includes animals incinerated in new build incinerators which are currently licensed to burn carcase material but not offals.

In order to help clear the backlog of OTMS animals awaiting slaughter following the scheme's introduction in 1996, carcases were held temporarily in cold store. At 1 May 1997, some 134,500 OTMS carcases were still in cold storage, but these had all been removed and rendered by the end of October 1997. No SCS carcases have been put into cold storage.

At the end of February 1998, stocks of MBM stood at 318,600 tonnes, of which 8,700 tonnes was from the rendering of SCS animals. The cost of storing this material is £179,000 per week (of which £14,000 for the MBM from the SCS). The equivalent stock position as at 1 May 1997 was some 199,000 tonnes of MBM, of which 200 tonnes was from the SCS.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Domestic Abuse

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment the Minister for Women has made of the report of the Royal College of Midwives entitled. "Domestic Abuse of Pregnant Women" what plans she has to bring it to the attention of (a) the police and (b) other relevant professionals; and if she will make a statement. [29682]

Ms Ruddock: We welcome the report. The guidelines offer real support for midwives in dealing with very sensitive situations. It helps them to know the signs, both physical and emotional, to look for and how to help the woman involved and her children. The report has been brought to the attention of Home Office Ministers who have responsibility for domestic violence and the Police. Other professional groups are developing their own guidelines for their members.

Disability Benefits

Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will itemise total expenditure on each of the disability benefits in the United Kingdom in (a) 1979–80 and (b) 1996–97, at 1996–97 prices, with the corresponding numbers of recipients; and if she will list, with dates, the legislation between 1979 and 1997, inclusive, other than annual upratings, which affected those numbers and costs. [29207]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 12 February 1998]: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is set out in the tables which have been placed in the Library.

Consultants

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is her estimate of the expenditure of her (a) Department, (b) agencies and (c) non-departmental public bodies on external consultants in (i) 1995–96, (ii) 1996–97, (iii) 1997–98 to date and (iv) 1997–98 full year; and if she will also estimate the cost savings resulting from the employment of such consultants for each of the above years. [26619]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 5 February 1998]: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is set out in the table.

The Department has produced its own guidance on buying and using consultancy based on the findings of the Efficiency Unit Scrutiny Report on the use of External Consultants published in August 1994. This has been supplemented by individual Agency procedural guidance. External Consultants are only engaged when internal resources are not available; best procurement practices are followed to ensure that value for money is obtained; and assignments are subject to a post implementation review where appropriate. Not all consultancy projects lend themselves to analysis in terms of resultant savings; however the intelligent and selective use of consultants has delivered worthwhile solutions and benefits for the Department.

Tribunals

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many social security tribunal hearings were lodged in each of the 12 months preceding and succeeding October 1996 (a) in Birmingham, (b) in the West Midlands Region and (c) nationally for each benefit; and what was the percentage of cases heard orally. [31271]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The information is not available in the form requested. Such information as is available is set out in the tables entitled "The number of appeals lodged at Social Security Appeal Tribunals (SSAT) in the Independent Tribunal Service, and the number of appeals heard and decided by SSATS, for the twelve months preceding and succeeding October 1996", copies of which have been placed in the Library.

Conferences

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many of her officials attended conferences (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) overseas; and how many and what percentage made (i) oral and (ii) written contributions to the matters under discussion in the last 12 months for which figures are available. [31168]

Mr. Field: The information is not collected.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants in receipt of (a) higher mobility rate of disability living allowance and (b) the highest care rate of disability living allowance have to date been subjected to the Benefits Integrity Programme in (a) Dundee, (b) Scotland and (c) the United Kingdom; how many in each category have had their benefit reduced as a result; and what is the total saving in each category. [29986]

Mr. Denham: The Benefit Integrity Project aims to ensure that those in receipt of DLA are entitled to it. While it is right to check that people are receiving the correct amount of benefit, we are determined that those checks should be undertaken as sensitively as possible. Also, that we should ensure all decisions taken as a result of the project are right. We have, therefore, acted to introduce an extra safeguard to improve the quality of, and confidence in, benefit decisions made by the Project.

The administration of this programme is a matter for Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend with further details.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. John McAllion, dated 12 March 1998:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked Peter Mathison to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many claimants in receipt of (a) higher mobility rate of Disability Living Allowance (DLA) and (b) the highest care rate of DLA have to date been subjected to the Benefits Integrity Programme (BIP) in (a) Dundee, (b) Scotland and (c) the United Kingdom; how many in each category have had their benefit reduced as a result; and what is the total saving in each category. As Mr Mathison is away from the office on leave, I am replying.

The information is not available in the format requested. The database of casework has not been designed to extract information geographically during the project. To do so would necessitate high cost and disruption to the processing of ongoing casework. However, once the casework has been completed a full evaluation of the data is planned to provide a geographical analysis.

All BIP cases involve customers with entitlement to higher rate mobility component combined with either highest or middle rate care component of DLA. As at 31 January 1998, a total of 54,839 cases, have been examined as part of the BIP. Of these total cases dealt with 1,299 have had their benefit increased, 6,884 have had their benefit reduced and 3,926 have had their benefit disallowed. The total includes 10,811 renewal cases, of which 334 have had their benefit increased, 2,907 have had their benefit reduced and 1,969 have had their benefit disallowed.

Of the cases looked at by BIP 16,562 customers have the highest rate care component. Of these 3,475 have had reductions to benefit. These reductions may involve the mobility component, the care component or both components.

A monthly statistical report is produced and a copy of the report for January 1998 can be found in the House of Commons Library.

An up to date savings assessment is not currently available, but we have this under review. I will write to you again as soon as this information becomes available.

I hope you find the reply helpful.

Retirement Pension

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what national insurance contribution rate would be required in 2003–04 if the basic retirement pension and linked benefits were increased to the same proportion of average earnings as in 1980, with corresponding increases in the lower and upper earnings limits. [31595]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 26 February 1998]: Information for 2003–04 is not available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, if in 2001–02 the basic retirement pension and linked benefits were increased to the same proportion of average earnings as in 1980, with corresponding increases in the lower and upper earnings limits, the main Class 1 contribution rates required for employees and employers would be 13.8 per cent. and 12.4 per cent. respectively. This estimate assumes that each contribution rate would be set so that on full-time average earnings the employee and the employer would pay the same amount of additional contributions.

Government Actuary's Department.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the expected cost of (a) the basic retirement pension and (b) linked benefits in (1) 1998–99, (2) 1999–2000 and (3) 2000–01, assuming upratings in April 1999 and 2000 in line with (i) prices and (ii) average earnings; and in each case what rate of Class 1 national insurance contributions this would imply in each of those years. [31596]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 26 February 1998]: The figures for the basic Retirement Pension (RP) expenditure and National Insurance Contribution (NIC) rates in 1998–99 can be found in the "Report by the Government Actuary on the drafts of the Social Security Benefits Up-rating Order 1998 and the Social Security (Contributions) (Re-rating and National Insurance Fund Payments) Order 1998".

If RP and the linked benefits were to continue to be uprated by prices, we would not envisage any change to the current national insurance rates in 1999–2000 or 2000–01. To offset the extra cost of uprating basic RP and the linked benefits by earnings in April 1999 and April 2000, we estimate that Class 1 NIC rates would stay constant in 1999–2000 and would need to be raised by 0.1 per cent. for employers and 0.2 per cent. for employees in 2000–01.

Uprating by prices

	1999–00	2000–01
Expenditure on basic retirement pension	32,160	33,160
Expenditure on linked benefits	6,350	6,510

Uprating by average earnings

£ million

	1999–00	2000–01
Expenditure on basic retirement pension	32,380	34,020
Expenditure on linked benefits	6,390	6,680

Cold Weather Payments

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what factors underlie her Department's allocation of moneys for cold weather payments to those in receipt of a personal pension in excess of the cut off point for income support; and if she will make a statement; [31603]

(2) what factors underlie her Department's allocation of moneys for cold weather payments to those on income support; and if she will make a statement. [31602]

Mr. Denham: The Government made a manifesto commitment to set up a review of central areas of insecurity for elderly people, including all aspects of the basic pension and its value; and second pensions including SERPS. The key objective of the Government's Pensions Review is to ensure that pensioners should have an adequate income in retirement; that they should share fairly in rising prosperity; and that public finances should be both sustainable and affordable. The Government are also committed to examining ways of delivering more automatic help to the poorest pensioners. It is estimated that one million do not receive the Income Support to which they are entitled. Research has been commissioned into why they do not claim Income Support. Last November, we announced funding of £15 million for a number of pilot schemes, starting in April, to help find the most effective way of getting Income Support to pensioners who do not claim it.

During his pre-budget statement, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that the Government were not prepared to allow another winter to go by, when pensioners are fearful of turning up their heating, even on the coldest winter days, because they do not know whether they will have the help they need for their fuel bills. He announced that a total of £400 million was being committed to help all pensioners with fuel bills to pay, for this winter and next—each pensioner household receiving £20, but the poorest receiving Income Support £50.

This is an unprecedented initiative and is the first time any Government have been prepared to help all pensioners with their winter fuel bills.

Around one and a half million pensioners receiving Income Support or income-based Jobseeker's Allowance have already received their Winter Fuel Payment of £50. The other eight and a half million eligible pensioners should receive their payment by the end of March.

Overall, almost ten million payments will be made to over seven million pensioner households.

The Winter Fuel Payments are in addition to any Cold Weather Payments which may also be made to pensioners, the disabled, or people with a child under the age of five, receiving Income Support or income-based Jobseeker's Allowance if there is a period of very cold weather.

Incomes

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will publish a table showing the equivalised income after income tax and national insurance payments of (a) a single person without dependants, (b) a lone parent with one child aged four years, (c) a lone parent with two children aged four and six years, (d) a single earner married couple with one child aged four years and (e) a single earner married couple with two children aged four and six years, assuming there are no child care costs, housing costs are £75 per week and all available benefits are claimed where the gross income is (i) £150, (ii) £200, (iii) £250, (iv) £300 and (v) £400 per week and is wholly from employment; and if she will state in which decile of the distribution of equivalised incomes before housing costs the individual would fall. [32409]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The information is set out in the table.

Notes:

1. Net incomes before housing costs have been derived using the 1995–96 version of the Tax Benefit Model (TBM). The TBM is designed to illustrate the weekly financial circumstances of a selection of hypothetical local authority and private tenants.
2. The net income before housing costs (NIBHC) figures reflect each family's net weekly income after income tax, National Insurance Contributions and all income from benefits (including Child Benefit) have been taken into account; but before housing costs (rent and Council Tax).
3. It has been assumed that the £75 per week housing costs specified in the question are comprised of £65 per week rent and £10 per week Council Tax.
4. The table reflects the situation for both local authority and private tenants; at any given level of rent and Council Tax, net incomes are the same for both local authority and private tenants. Owner occupiers are not covered by the table.
5. It has been assumed that the gross earnings levels specified in the question are the result of full-time employment of more than 30 hours per week. Therefore, the 30-hour Family Credit premium of £10 per week is in payment.
6. The net income deciles have been calculated from the Households Below Avenge Income (HBA) dataset, based on the 1995–96 Family Resources Survey, and are the latest available. The decile breaks (at January 1996 prices) are: £118, £144, £169, £195, £227, £262, £303, £363 and £463. The NIBHC figures have been equivalised using the McClement's scale, as used in Department's publication 'Households Below Average Income' (HBA).
7. Apart from the assumptions made specific to the question, the TBM also rests on a number of more general assumptions:

(a) No tax allowances apart from personal allowances are in operation;
(b) There is no reduced tax liability for spells of unemployment or sickness earlier in the tax year;
(c) National Insurance Contributions are paid at the not contracted out rate;
(d) The family type actually takes up all of the benefits they are entitled to;
(e) The family receives no income from earnings, benefits or capital other than that shown in the table.

State Earnings-related Pensions

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which of the recommendations in the Government Actuary's Department report of December 1998 on contracting-out of SERPS she (a) has implemented and (b) has not implemented. [32972]

Mr. Denham: The Government Actuary in November 1997 was asked for his views on the effect of a number of factors on the national insurance rebates. His report gave advice but did not make recommendations. When deciding on the new rebate levels we did, of course, take careful note of his advice but also had to consider the impact of recent trends in pensions on the resources available to the National Insurance Fund.

Millennium Compliance

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when testing on Year 2000 compliance will be completed within her Department. [32999]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The Department plans to complete testing on its major computer applications before the end of 1998. The target for testing and completing the remaining elements is the end of August 1999. Copies of the Department's published plans are available in the Library and the Internet.

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will make a statement about progress on the action being taken to ensure the millennium compliance of computer systems involved in the issuing of benefits and pensions; if contingency plans are being prepared; and if local departmental offices will be open on 3 January 2000. [33320]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The Department is on target against its published plans to achieve Year 2000 compliance of the major systems which are key to the payment of benefits and pensions and the collection of contributions. All major systems will be compliant before the end of 1998 to allow a full year's running before 2000.

We already have contingency plans in place to ensure that business continuity is not disrupted as a result of external influences. We are receiving these plans with the Year 2000 in mind. We will take any necessary action as a result.

The Department for Culture, Media and Sport is conducting a consultative exercise about the public holiday dates to be assigned at the millennium and we await the outcome to inform our planning process.

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if her Department is represented at meetings of the International Social Security Association to discuss the millennium compliance of computer systems; if best practices are being shared internationally; and if she will make a statement. [33313]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The Department of Social Security is represented at meetings of the International Social Security Association (ISSA) and we have fully participated in discussions on the millennium compliance of computer systems.

As part of the sharing of information on this issue, the Department submitted an article for inclusion in an ISSA publication circulated to all members.

Tinnitus

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will recognise tinnitus related to service in the armed forces for pension and benefits purposes; [32995]

(2) if she will make a statement on the Government's policy on granting pensions to ex-servicemen who suffer from tinnitus. [32997]

Mr. Denham: Tinnitus is a symptom not a discrete pathology or diagnosis. It can be due to many causes other than ear pathologies.

Where tinnitus is linked to disablement which is due to service it will be included as part and parcel of that disablement and may result in an increased assessment of the disablement and therefore an increased pension. Tinnitus is therefore, already recognised and considered when determining the level of an award under the War Pension Scheme.

Disability Premium

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security on what date the present £15 earnings disregard for people who qualify for the disability premium within income support was introduced; what increases reflecting inflation have been made to this sum; if inflation adjustments will be considered for future periods; and if she will make a statement. [33335]

Mr. Denham: The present £15 earnings disregard was introduced in April 1988 and, in common with other disregards, has not been increased to reflect inflation. However, we continue to review benefits paid to sick and disabled people as part of our commitment to modernise the Social Security system. No decisions have yet been reached, but we will consult disabled people, their organisations and others with an interest before making any changes.

Public Appointments

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many of the appointments to public bodies which she has made since 1 May 1997 have been from the Public Appointments Unit list. [33248]

Mr. Field: Nominations of candidates for appointment to this Department's public bodies are sought from a wide range of sources, including the Public Appointments Unit and advertising. Many of the public bodies are of a specialist nature and their appointees are drawn from a specialist field. Since 1 May 1997 no appointments have been made from the Public Appointments Unit list.

Social Fund

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many requests for a review of social fund decisions have been turned down in the current financial year on the grounds that the letter of authority was a photocopy; and if she will made a statement. [33340]

Mr. Denham: The information is not available in the format requested. In 1997–98, April 1997 to the end of January 1998, 3,445 requests for review of social fund decisions were refused because they were not made in the correct time, form and manner specified by the regulations. The number of review applications refused represent 1 per cent. of all applications for a review of social fund decisions conducted in the Benefits Agency.

Applications for review are not normally refused on the grounds that the letter of authority was a photocopy.

The Social Fund (Application for Review) Regulations 1988 specify the time, form and manner in which applications for review are to be made. The regulations provide that an application for review must be made in writing, giving specific grounds on which it is made and must be signed by the applicant. Where the application for review is made on behalf of the applicant by someone who is not the applicant's appointee, the applicant must give written consent to the application being made on his or her behalf.

Nuclear Test Veterans

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in what year each of the war pensions for former service personnel who participated in the nuclear tests programmes in Australia and the South Pacific and developed multiple myeloma were awarded. [33876]

Mr. Denham: The information is in the table.

Awards of war disablement and war widows pension

Year of award	Awards of war disablement pension	Awards of war widows pension
1990	1	1
1994	1	—
1995	2	—
Total	10	3

Dividend Tax Credits

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment she has made of the report by Bacon and Woodrow, actuarial consultants, on the consequences of the abolition of dividend tax credits for the minimum funding required of occupational pension schemes; and if she will make a statement. [34288]

Mr. Denham: It is for the Pensions Board of the Faculty and Institute of Actuaries to make recommendations about any changes to the minimum funding requirement. They will no doubt take account of views in Bacon and Woodrow's paper. We expect to receive a report from the Pensions Board when they have completed their consideration of these issues.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nigeria

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent assessment he has made of the human rights situation in Nigeria. [33615]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We remain deeply concerned about the human rights situation in Nigeria. In particular: the continued detention of Chief Abiola, leading trades unionists Frank Kokori and Milton Dabibi and other political prisoners despite General Abacha's 17 November 1997 Amnesty; the death in detention of Shehu Musa Yar'Adua on 8 December 1997. We are also concerned about health of other prisoners including General Obasanjo and Dr. Beko Ransome-Kuti. In 1997, the Nigerian Human Rights Commission made a number of recommendations for improving prison conditions. There has been no response to date; the continued harassment of journalists (some 18 journalists remain in detention) and human rights/pro-democracy activists who were forcibly prevented from staging a rally in Lagos on 3 March; the failure to resolve the case of the 20 Ogonis facing the same charges as Ken Saro-Wiwa. We have also received reports that in January, up to 100 Ogonis were detained, that Ogoni Mr. Daniel Naador died in January while in custody, and that a woman was shot and killed when the Rivers State Internal Security Task Force fired into the crowd during an Ogoni day event. We are also concerned about the whereabouts and health of Mr. Batom Mitee, brother of Movement for the Survival of the Ogoni People (MOSOP)'s Acting President.

As Presidency of the EU, we will be working for a further strong Resolution at the Commission for Human Rights in Geneva in April 1998. We are disappointed that the Nigerian authorities have still not responded to the UN Special Rapporteur for Nigeria's request to visit the country to allow him to fulfil his mandate.

Ministerial Travel

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) of 19 January 1998, Official Report, columns 438–39, on ministerial travel, when he decided to return to the United Kingdom between Her Majesty the Queen's state visits to the capitals of Pakistan and India. [34082]

Mr. Robin Cook: The travel plans for the visits I made to Pakistan and India were decided in July in the light of the agreement reached with Buckingham Palace that I should be in attendance on Her Majesty The Queen in Islamabad on 7 and 8 October and in Delhi on 13 and 14 October.

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs where the official Government car was based that was used to transfer him from Terminal 4 to Terminal 1 at Heathrow Airport when he returned to the United Kingdom during the Queen's visit to India and Pakistan; and how many miles it travelled whilst carrying out this job. [34364]

Mr. Robin Cook: My official car is based at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. The round trip to Heathrow is 40 miles.

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the cost of providing an official Government car to transfer him from Terminal 4 to Terminal 1 at Heathrow Airport when he returned to the United Kingdom during the Queen's visit to India and Pakistan; and if he will list the passengers in the car. [34363]

Mr. Robin Cook: There was no cost to public funds.

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office have an annual contract with the Government Car Service who provide my official car. This contract covers the car itself, the driver as well as fuel and all other costs, for a period of up to 15 hours a day, from Monday to Friday throughout the year (except public holidays). I was accompanied in the car by my partner, Ms Gaynor Regan, and by my protection officer.

Arrangements for my travel by car within Britain are made by my protection officers. There has been no change since the previous Administration when it was the practice that the Secretary of State was transferred by official car between aeroplanes.

EU Presidency (Children)

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the use of children to promote the United Kingdom presidency of the European Union; from which department the idea originated; and what factors determined the schools approached. [34000]

Mr. Doug Henderson: One aim of the UK Presidency of the EU is to bring Europe closer to young people. To this end, a design company retained by the FCO invited children, selected by them, to design the Presidency logo. We have also organised a competition, open to all 11–15 year olds in the UK, called "Ambassador for a Day". The UK Education Departments have organised the "Celebrating Europe" competition, open to all schools, colleges and youth groups. These projects aim to involve young people in the UK Presidency, not to use them to promote it.

President Suharto

Dr. Desmond Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the status of the forthcoming visit to Great Britain of President Suharto of Indonesia. [34110]

Mr. Fatchett: Together with other Heads of State/Government from Asia and Europe, President Suharto has been invited to attend the Asia Europe Summit Meeting to be held in London on 3–4 April.

Gibraltar

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has lodged a formal complaint with the European Commission regarding Spain's non-acceptance of the Gibraltar identity card; and if he will make a statement. [34136]

Mr. Doug Henderson: We formally complained to the European Commission in October 1995 about Spain's refusal to accept Gibraltar ID cards as valid travel documents within the EU/EEA under the terms of Directive 68/360/EEC. The complaint is now being pursued through the procedures of the Commission with whom we remain in close touch.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of Spain's warning that its controls over

Gibraltar will be increased if negotiations on the future of the Rock do not progress; and if he will make a statement. [34137]

Mr. Doug Henderson: We do not accept that there should be a link between the controls Spain operates at the Spain/Gibraltar border and any discussion about Gibraltar's status. Spain has the right to carry out customs controls as Gibraltar is outside the Community Customs Territory. The Spanish Foreign Minister has given an assurance that delays will be kept to a minimum. We look to Spain to respect that assurance and to ensure that any checks are proportionate.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the European Commission has commenced infraction procedures with Spain in her non-compliance with European Union law through non-acceptance of the Gibraltar identity card; and if he will make a statement. [34138]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The competent Directorate of the European Commission has written to Spain and to other Member States seeking the recognition of Gibraltar ID cards as valid for travel throughout the EU/EEA. We remain in close touch with the Commission on the subject.

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had concerning the situation of Moroccan workers originally invited to Gibraltar to work for the Ministry of Defence and subsequently made redundant. [34294]

Mr. Doug Henderson: I have discussed the situation of Moroccan workers with the Chief Minister of Gibraltar and with representatives of the TGWU in Britain and Gibraltar.

Environmental Assessment

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will take steps to ensure that all UN projects are subject to environmental assessment. [34477]

Mr. Fatchett: We share the hon. Member's concern that UN projects should be subject to appropriate environmental appraisal. We have raised these issues in UN fora and will continue to do so.

Human Rights

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what priority will be accorded to human rights issues in the agenda for the ASEM II Conference to be held in London in April; and if he will make a statement. [34476]

Mr. Fatchett: We look forward to a wide-ranging, informal and productive political discussion at ASEM 2 and expect to touch on human rights. Leaders at the first ASEM 2 made clear that political dialogue, including consideration of fundamental rights, was one of the key dimensions of ASEM. The successful seminar on Human Rights and the Rule of Law held in Lund, Sweden on 11–13 December 1997 encourages us to pursue this dialogue.

China

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when a resumption of substantive dialogue with China on human rights was resumed; and if he will list the positive steps taken by China as a result. [34484]

Mr. Fatchett: Since the resumption of the EU/China human rights dialogue on 23 October 1997, China has taken a number of positive steps. These include signature of the International Covenant on Economic Social and Cultural Rights, invitation to the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights to visit China and agreement to transmit Hong Kong reports under UN Covenants

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance (a) the Government and (b) the European Union proposes to improve human rights in China. [34517]

Mr. Fatchett: The government are supporting a range of projects aimed at promoting legal and administrative reform in China and are currently examining a project aimed at improving child welfare. The EU has agreed an assistance package which includes legal training and village governance, as well as projects supporting rights of women and orphans.

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which Minister attended the EU/China human rights meeting in Peking on 1 and 2 December; what subjects were discussed and if he will place in the Library a copy of the communiqué issued. [34483]

Mr. Fatchett: The EU/China human rights meeting 1–2 December was held at senior official level. The two sides discussed a wide range of human rights concerns including co-operation with United Nations human rights mechanisms, individual cases, the death penalty and Tibet. Agreement was reached on a cooperation programme. No communique was issued.

Uganda

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to encourage multi-party democracy in Uganda. [34496]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Democratic principles are a central element in our political dialogue with the Government of Uganda. It is for the Ugandan people to decide what form democracy should take in their country. They will have an opportunity to do so in the referendum scheduled for 2000. We look to President Museveni to ensure that constitutional provisions relating to the referendum are fully implemented, including those that will enable advocates of a multi-party system to put their case to the electorate without restrictions. Legislation on political parties is scheduled for debate during the current session of the Ugandan Parliament.

St. Helena

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the lease signed on 27 November 1992 allowing St. Helena Airport Ltd. to construct an airstrip on St. Helena was previously presented to (i) LEGCO and (ii) EXCO for comment or agreement. [34293]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Yes. The St. Helena Government, i.e. Executive Council, have been consulted at every step.

Azerbaijan

Gillian Merron: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the United Kingdom will continue to uphold the OSCE embargo on the export of weapons and munitions to Azerbaijan. [34717]

Mr. Doug Henderson: We remain committed to the OSCE embargo against both Azerbaijan and Armenia, which the UK interprets as covering all goods and technology controlled under entries in Part III of Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994 (commonly known as the Military List).

Following consultation with this Department and the Ministry of Defence, and in line with the defence export criteria of July 1997, the Department for Trade and Industry recently issued a licence for the export of equipment containing military explosives, for use in the oil industry in Azerbaijan. While the grant of this licence constitutes an exception to the UK's interpretation of the scope of the embargo, it is in no way inconsistent with the purpose of the embargo and our continuing commitment to uphold it.

Drugs

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what changes the Government plan to propose to the meeting in June on drugs of the UN General Assembly to the UN conventions of 1961, 1971 and 1988. [34744]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We do not plan to propose any changes to the UN Drug Conventions at the UN General Assembly meeting on drugs.

Correspondence

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will reply to the letter of 11 December 1997 from the hon. Member for Spelthorne concerning Mr. M. Al-Dujaili of Shepperton. [34282]

Mr. Fatchett: My noble friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs expects to reply to the hon. Member's letter within one week.

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Spelthorne dated 6 January concerning Mr. G. S. Wright of Shepperton. [34283]

Mr. Fatchett: A reply was sent to the hon. Member on 10 March.

Information on research commissioned by my Department's agencies is not held centrally. The information requested for the years (b) 1998–99, (c) 1999–2000, (d) 2000–2001 and (e) 2001–2002 is not currently available.

Adult Education

Ms Shipley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on his Department's initiatives for adult education in (a) the West Midlands, (b) Stourbridge and (c) the United Kingdom. [31841]

Dr. Howells: My right hon Friend the Secretary of State set out his proposals for adult education in England in his Green paper, The Learning Age, published on 25 February. My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales, Northern Ireland and Scotland, who are responsible for education and training policy in these parts of the United Kingdom, are taking forward the Government's adult learning agenda in their countries.

At the local level in England, the responsibility for securing adequate further education was divided between the Further Education Funding Council (FEFC) and local education authorities (LEAs) under the Further and Higher Education Act 1992.

In Stourbridge, as elsewhere, my right hon. Friend wishes to encourage sensible local planning. In The Learning Age, he urges all local partners in education and training, including LEAs and the FEFC, to work together to develop relevant and cost-effective provision for their communities.

Performing Arts

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he expects to be able to announce a new system of support for students of the performing arts; and if he will make a statement. [30801]

Dr. Howells: The Minister for the Arts and I have asked our officials to develop proposals for a new system of support by the Summer, following which the Government will announce their response.

Young Unemployed

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the implementation of the New Deal for young unemployed people. [32888]

Mr. Andrew Smith: It is, of course, early days, but I am encouraged by the progress made in the New Deal Pathfinder areas, including Eastbourne. Across the country we have seen over 10,000 young people enter the Gateway and already there have been successful referrals to unsubsidised jobs and the four New Deal Options.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what communication support will be available for the education and training option under the New Deal for the young unemployed; and if he will make a statement. [34428]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Where education and training providers do not already have the necessary equipment available, applications can be made to a Discretionary Fund to cover exceptional costs of training within the Full-Time Education and Training (FTET) option. The Fund is designed to ensure that education and training can be accessed where additional barriers to participation exist. Applications to the Fund can be made for special equipment or other assistance needed by young people with disabilities.

Pathfinder Areas

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what information his Department is making available on the criteria for selection of Pathfinder areas and the process put in place to monitor the delivery of the New Deal. [32884]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Pathfinder areas were selected to provide a cross section of delivery areas in Great Britain. They comprise a sample of travel to work areas covering a variety of urban and rural locations of different sizes. The process is overseen by local partnerships and delivery of New Deal in the Pathfinder areas is monitored nationally and regionally.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what sanctions have been applied to New Deal participants in the pathfinder areas; and if he will make a statement. [34425]

Mr. Andrew Smith: New Deal has been operating in twelve Pathfinder areas since 5 January 1998. In the nine weeks of delivery up to 6 March 1998, no New Deal sanctions have been applied. Young people have warmly welcomed the New Deal and many have sought early entry.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what are the latest figures from the Pathfinder areas of New Deal in respect of the number of participants (a) gaining unsubsidised employment and (b) entering a New Deal Option. [34433]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The great majority of young people who have entered the New Deal are currently participating in the Gateway, a period of up to four months preparation for work and entry to the options. The number of young people gaining unsubsidised employment in the period 5 January to 6 March in the New Deal Pathfinder areas was 289. The number of young people entering a New Deal option in the same period was 574.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what alterations are being made to the Design of the New Deal for 18 to 24 year olds as a result of his Department's evaluation of data from the Pathfinder areas; and if he will make a statement. [34440]

Mr. Andrew Smith: We have very early evidence from the pathfinders about the operation of the New Deal processes which will be taken into account in the national roll-out. In the longer term, monitoring and evaluation of the New Deal will produce evidence on the basis of which possible amendments to its design will be considered. It is presently premature to draw conclusions other than that the initial Gateway interviews have been well received by clients, and sufficient time must be allowed to enable these to establish effective rapport and impart useful advice.

Public Appointments

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many of the appointments to public bodies which he has made since 1 May 1997 have been from the Public Appointments Unit list. [33252]

Dr. Howells: The Department seeks nominations of candidates for appointment to public bodies from a wide range of sources, including the Public Appointments Unit. Since 1 May 1997, two of the individuals appointed by the Department have been provided by the Public Appointments Unit.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what arrangements Training and Enterprise Councils have in place in respect of (a) monitoring and evaluation of their work in terms of efficiency, effectiveness, fairness to clients and value for money, (b) auditing of annual accounts by a public body and (c) public access to meetings of (i) TEC boards and (ii) other decision-making committees and panels; and whether the minutes of these bodies are available to the public. [33216]

Dr. Howells: Through our contract we expect Training and Enterprise Councils to review regularly their performance and capability against agreed standards to retain their Licences. These standards include arrangements for quality assurance of their training suppliers, a commitment to continuous improvement and compliance with the TEC National Council's Framework for Local Accountability.

TECs are also required under the terms of their Licence to permit the National Audit Office, the European Commission or the European Court of Auditors access to their own records and those of any of their subsidiaries and/or their providers. However as private companies they are obliged to have their accounts audited by a qualified auditor.

TECs are not required to allow public access to Board meetings but the Framework for Local Accountability expects TECs to open as many Board papers as reasonable to public scrutiny and brief interested parties on the outcomes of Board discussions in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee on Standards in Public Life.

Publications

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list those European Commission (a) newsletters, (b) magazines and (c) occasional publications to which his Department subscribes. [33664]

Dr. Howells: The DfEE Information and Library Network (ILN) subscribes to or holds copies of the following European Commission publications:

(a) Newsletters: European Parliament News; News from the Foundation (European Foundation for the Improvement of Living and Working Conditions); ERGO; Erasmus; ESF Info Review.

(b) Journals/magazines: Bulletin of the EU; Employment Observatory Policies and Trends; European Centre for Work and Society News; European Economy and supplements; Eurostatistics; Eurobarometer; Euro Express; Janus; Official Journal of the EC (Parts C and L); Sigma; Eurostat publications—Accounts and surveys series; Statistics in focus; CEDEFOP reports and Information.

(c) Occasional publications: Employment in Europe.

New Deal

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will extend the age range of those eligible to benefit from the New Deal. [33907]

Mr. Andrew Smith: New Deal provision for people of 25 and over who have been unemployed for two years or more will be available from June 1998. I announced on 5 January that we would consider development of the pilots to extend New Deal to people over 25 who have been unemployed for a year or 18 months. These would need to be thoroughly evaluated before decisions could be taken on further extension.

Access Courses

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if participants in the New Deal for 18 to 24 year olds will be able to study for Access Course at NVQ level 3; and if he will make a statement. [34421]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Full-Time Education and Training option of the New Deal is primarily aimed at giving a second chance to gain qualifications for those young people who are not already qualified to NVQ Level 2 or equivalent. However, approval for an Access to Higher Education course can be given where it is clear that completion of the course is the best way to enhance a young person's employability. The course must form part of a realistic action plan leading to sustained employment, and must offer the opportunity for the young person to gain transferable skills such as Key Skills.

New Deal (Long-term Unemployed)

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he expects the Design of the New Deal for the Long Term Unemployed to be issued; and if he will make a statement. [34431]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The New Deal provision for adults who have been unemployed for two years or more will begin in June this year. This provision will offer people a range of advice and help to get them back to work. In particular, we will be introducing an employer subsidy of £75 a week for up to six months, and the opportunity for people from this group to study full-time for an employment-related qualification for up to a year whilst remaining on JSA. We will begin preliminary discussions later this month with strategic partners, both at national and local levels. We plan to issue a document describing the design of this programme in early May.

We will also be piloting, later this year, a further extension of the New Deal approach for adults who have been unemployed for less than two years.

New Deal (Voluntary Sector)

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps he is taking to ensure that the (a) Environmental Task Force providers, (b) the voluntary sector and (c) ethnic minority organisations within the New Deal are fully involved in the delivery and provision of the New Deal; and if he will make a statement. [34424]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Employment Service has ensured that the Environment Task Force providers, the voluntary sector and ethnic minority organisations have been fully involved in the development and delivery of New Deal. We have taken particular care to ensure that these groups have been fully represented both in national consultations on the design of New Deal and in local partnerships, which have planned and are now setting in place delivery arrangements. We value their support and will continue to work closely with them as New Deal rolls out nationally.

Access to Work

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if Access to Work support will be provided for all elements of the New Deal with particular reference to non-waged voluntary options for young people aged between 18 and 24 years; and if he will make a statement. [34427]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Access to Work will be available for young people aged between 18 and 24 years old if they are on the Employment Option, the waged Environment Task Force Option and the waged Voluntary Sector Option.

Disabled people not in paid employment will not be eligible for Access to Work. However, help of the kind provided through Access to Work is available for those on the unwaged voluntary sector option, the unwaged Environment Task Force Option and the Full Time Education and Training Option from the funding available for New Deal.

New Deal (Rural Areas)

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what extra help rural areas will receive through the New Deal for 18 to 24 year olds, with regard to the problem of transport in rural areas; and if he will make a statement. [34420]

Mr. Andrew Smith: In planning the delivery of New Deal all local partnerships have fully taken into account a wide range of local factors, including the availability of transport. Innovative local solutions are being developed by partnerships, including a number which have secured concessionary fares for New Deal participants. In addition, the Rural Development Commission (the Government's agency for economic and social development in rural England) has allocated £200k of its funds, to support projects that will test solutions to the problems of delivering New Deal to remote rural communities where public transport is scarce.

New Deal Placements

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people he expects to be sanctioned for not taking up a placement on the New Deal in its first year of operation; and if he will make a statement. [34432]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Our overriding aim in the New Deal for 18–24 year olds is to offer high quality help through the Gateway and opportunities for work, education and training which will encourage young people to participate. The early evidence from the Pathfinders is that this approach is succeeding; indeed, since 16 February when we started collecting this information, over 350 entered the programme early—about 10 per cent. of all those who started. We recognise of course that a small minority might not wish to take part. If they refuse offers of options without good cause, they will be referred to independent Adjudication Officers who may impose sanctions. As each case will depend on the circumstances and be treated on its merits, it is not possible to forecast the numbers affected.

New Deal (Colchester)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what factors led to the New Deal contract for the Colchester District being awarded to SEETEC Business Technology Centre Ltd. [34275]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The competition to award the contract to SEETEC Business Technology Centre Ltd. to deliver New Deal in Colchester was fair and open. The competition was conducted by ES officials in line with Treasury procurement principles and followed requirements set down by the European Commission.

ES officials evaluated the outline proposals against predetermined quality criteria. These included an assessment of the overall understanding of the New Deal requirement, quality of proposals for New Deal delivery, and how all the private sector organisations intended to interface and work with local partners. All successful bidders, including SEETEC, met the overall quality requirements and demonstrated expertise and an ability to deliver effectively New Deal in the areas where they were selected.

Ministerial Offices

Dr. Moonie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what were the total costs incurred between 1992 and May 1997 in moving the ministerial offices from Elizabeth House to Sanctuary Buildings. [34480]

Dr. Howells: The total cost incurred in moving the former Department of Education and Science HQ from Elizabeth House to Sanctuary Buildings was £13.7 million in the 1991–92 financial year. Costs relating to the Ministerial offices were contained within the overall project cost and it is not possible to identify them separately.

Student Funding

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is his estimate on (a) the present accounting basis and (b) a resource accounting basis of the yields from (i) student contributions to university tuition fees and (ii) the switch from maintenance grants to loans for each year from 1998–99 to 2015–16. [34434]

Dr. Howells: The following table shows the estimated savings from the Government's new funding policy for higher education in each year from 1998–99 to 2000–01 on the present cash accounting basis and on a resource accounting basis. Figures are for the United Kingdom and at 1995–96 prices. They do not reflect our decision to pay out loans on a termly basis, which released money in 1998–99.

£ million

	1998–99	1999–00	2000–01
Present accounting
Additional net loans expenditure[1]	(400)	(750)	(1,100)
Grants savings	250	600	850
Private contributions to tuition fees	150	250	400
Net savings	0	100	150
Resource accounting[2]
Additional net loans expenditure[1]	(50)	(100)	(250)
Net savings	350	750	1,050

[2] Methods of implementing resource accounting are still being determined. The figures presented here are based on the Department's present assumptions. Grants savings and private contributions to tuition fees are the same under cash accounting and resource accounting.

Figures are not available for later years, where the breakdown between loans expenditure and savings from grants and private contributions to tuition fees depends on a number of assumptions. However the estimated net savings in 2002–03 and 2015–16 are £250m and £1,100m on the present accounting basis and £1,050m and £650m on a resource accounting basis.

TREASURY

Euro

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he plans to make to the Euro-X Committee on the management of the Euro; and what assessment he has made of the effects of (a) a soft and (b) a hard Euro on sterling. [33807]

Mrs. Liddell: The Chancellor of the Exchequer regularly attends meetings of the ECOFIN Council which is the only decision making body on EU economic coordination.

The Government want to see a stable and competitive pound over the medium term, consistent with their objective of price stability. Government policy is designed to achieve low inflation and sound public finances which are necessary conditions for sustained exchange rate stability.

Mr. C. Whelan

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which of the duties currently carried out by Mr. C. Whelan were formerly carried out by Ms Jill Rutter. [34418]

Mr. Gordon Brown: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 10 March 1998, Official Report, column 100.

(3) if he will provide a breakdown of the costs of millennium computer compliance for (a) the Army Base Storage and Distribution Agency, (b) the Army Training and Recruiting Agency, (c) the Army Technical Support Agency, (d) the Defence Bills Agency, (e) the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency, (f) the Defence Intelligence and Security Centre, (g) the Defence Postal and Courier Services Agency, (h) the Defence Transport and Movements Executive, (i) the Defence Vetting Agency, (j) the Joint Air Reconnaissance Intelligence Centre, (k) the Logistic Information Systems Agency, (l) the Meteorological Office, (m) the Ministry of Defence Police, (n) the Naval Recruiting and Training Agency, (o) the Pay and Personnel Agency, (p) the Royal Air Force Signals Engineering Establishment, (q) the Royal Air Force Training Group Defence Agency and (r) the United Kingdom Hydrographic Office. [32791]

Mr. Spellar: This is a matter for the Chief Executives of the Agencies concerned. I have asked them to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from C. L. Elliott to Dr. Julian Lewis, dated 13 March 1998:

I am replying to your Questions to the Secretary of State for Defence about testing for millennium compliance, consultants and contractors working on Year 2000 computer problems and the costs of millennium computer compliance, as these matters fall within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Army Training and Recruiting Agency (ATRA).

On the question of testing for millennium compliance, the ATRA is in the process of introducing a major new computer service throughout the organisation which is known as TAFMIS (the Training and Financial Management Information System). It is due for completion in 1999 and has been purchased as a PFI project and has, as part of the contract, been subjected to Year 2000 testing throughout its development, testing and introduction. In addition, by taking this approach, the ATRA have transferred the risk and responsibility for Year 2000 compliance to the service provider, EDS Defence Ltd.

There are some small legacy systems existing in the Agency which have been advised on procedures for testing. To date, no problems have been identified.

Other than EDS Defence Ltd, who are involved with the TAFMIS system, there are no other consultants or contractors working specifically on the Year 2000 computer problem within the ATRA. It is not possible to identify the costs of the millennium compliance work for the TAFMIS system.

I hope this is helpful.

Letter from N. Pearson to Dr. Julian Lewis, dated 13 March 1998:

I am replying to your Questions to the Secretary of State for Defence about millennium compliancy as this matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Joint Air Reconnaissance Intelligence Centre Defence Agency.

I have been asked to respond to all three of your questions, and to do so, I would like first to clarify some of the terms I have used. Our programme of testing for millennium compliancy has been followed by rectification, which has in turn been followed by validation of the systems. In some cases this validation has resulted in the need for further testing. While we anticipate that all rectification work should be complete by 31 Dec 98, there will be a need for continued validation work, possibly until the end of 1999. However, our mission-critical IT systems will have been rectified well before 31 December 98.

Testing for Millennium Compliancy. Testing for millennium compliancy has been undertaken in three phases.

a. Large IT Systems. All work on the mainframe systems should be complete by 31 Dec 98. However a major new system is due in service in Summer 1998 and there is some question about the compliancy of one of its software programmes. For this reason the manufacturer has undertaken to provide a software upgrade, by Sep 98, which will be compliant.

b. Personal Computers. All existing PCs will have been tested by 31 Dec 98. However, since there is a continuous flow of replacement PCs coming into the Agency, it is expected that testing will be continued right up to 31 Dec 99 and possibly beyond.

c. Embedded Systems and Utilities. JARIC Defence Agency occupies a building belonging to Royal Air Force Brampton. The Agency is therefore dependent on its landlord to work with the providers of public utilities and services such as air conditioning. The landlord has informed us that he anticipates meeting his obligations of ensuring that testing, rectification and validation will have been completed by 31 Dec 99.

Consultants and Contractors ICL (formerly DESC) are the only contractor employed by the Agency on millennium compliancy tasks.

The costs of millennium computer compliance The cost of millennium compliancy work at JARIC was originally estimated at £60,000. To date we have needed to spend £15,000, in order to provide software corrections to the mainframe systems.

I hope you will find that these answers give you the information you are seeking.

Letter from P. Ewins to Dr. Julian Lewis, dated 13 March 1998:

I am replying to your Questions to the Secretary of State for Defence about testing for millennium compliance, and the associated cost and consultancy implications. As Chief Executive of the Meteorological Office, this matter falls within my area of responsibility.

In the Met. Office, it is our aim to ensure that all individual or stand-alone business critical systems, with the exception of those due to be replaced in early 1999, are millennium compliant by December 1998. For those systems which are due to be replaced, tests to minimise the risks from date problems will also be completed by the end of this year. As far as integrated business critical systems are concerned, these will be Year 2000 compliant by September 1999 which means that the end-to-end testing will be complete by that date. A list of the consultants and contractors who have either worked or are working with us on Year 2000 computer problems is attached.

The estimated full cost of millennium compliance for the many business critical systems in the Met. Office is £8M. Much of this expenditure will be related to in-house staff effort which is assessed as 120-man years, at a cost of approximately £5M. The balance will primarily be spent on external consultants and contractors and the procurement of specific tools.

You may also like to know that, as a trading agency, the Met. Office falls outside the Vote structure, and that I have taken the decision to fund the project costs of compliance out of profits, thereby reducing substantially the cost impact on our customers, especially those in the public sector.

Letter from John Chisholm to Dr. Julian Lewis, dated 13 March 1998:

I have been asked to reply to your questions on millennium computer compliance on behalf of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) and I will answer all three questions in this letter.

In common with many other large organisations DERA has established a programme under which all systems are being addressed in a controlled priority order. Priority is dictated by safety, security and business criticality. In accordance with the deadline set by the Central IT Unit, DERA plans to have all its 'mission critical' (highest priority) systems assessed for compliance and rectified (if necessary), including associated testing, by December 1998. Medium priority systems and the majority of low priority systems will be assessed and rectified within 1999, with most being completed by the third quarter of 1999.

There are about 38 full and part-time consultants and contractors employed on Year 2000 activities in DERA from six different firms: Admiral, Comax, DARIUS Computing, DEC, Racon and Serco. This situation is subject to change and the information is provided for Tuesday 3 March 1998.

The cost to date of addressing the Year 2000 problem in DERA is approximately £1.1 million.

I hope this information is helpful.

Up until 31 March 1998, additional spend on millennium computer compliance has been: hardware £23,106.37; software £386.50; consultancy £9,165.00, giving a total spend of £32,657.87.

Letter from P. A. Tucker to Dr. Julian Lewis, dated 13 March 1998:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about when all testing for millennium compliance will be complete in the Defence Vetting Agency, as this falls within the area of responsibility of the Chief Executive of the Agency, who is out of the office on business.

The Defence Vetting Agency formed on 1st April 1997, from four separate vetting units—one in each of the Services, and one in the Ministry of Defence. The main systems used by the Agency are inherited, and there are service level agreements between the DVA (as customer) and the owners of these systems (as suppliers). The Agency does not therefore have prime responsibility for Year 2000 Compliance in respect of these systems, although it has sought confirmation from the respective suppliers that their systems will be made Year 2000 compliant.

In addition to the four major systems which the Agency uses, it owns some 120 assorted Personal Computers, 10 FAX machines, and 11 Photocopiers. A substantial number of these items are elderly and due for routine replacement before 2000. The remaining items will be checked individually for Year 2000 Compliance by September 1998, and replaced if necessary.

I hope this is helpful.
